Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe that the purpose of this bill is to grant a spending authority. Not spending amounts such as those Senator Tremblay has quoted. Some $852 million will be paid to the provinces as contributions to their health care programs under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act. What it does is authorize them to spend the money.

By adopting the proposed amendments to Bill C-3, we are not saying to the provinces "Go ahead, spend", but "You are hereby authorized to spend, but only according to the following changes".

Senator Tremblay: Which means that, should Bill C-3 be adopted, the amount which is being quoted as $872 million could increase or decrease depending on—

Senator Thériault: It has nothing to do—

Senator Tremblay: I am trying to assess the impact of Bill C-3. Our committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology is dealing with this issue just now; the only way to find out is to ask whether it will increase or decrease the estimates.

Do you mean to say that there is no connection? Then, when dealing with this part of Bill C-3, it will be useless to ask questions.

Senator Frith: In my opinion—

Senator Tremblay: It is the object of the bill.

Senator Frith: Yes, I think that it can be stated that Bill C-3 has no relation to the bill now before us. That bill is an act to provide spending authority. We are not asked to make expenditures but we do have the borrowing authority. What will happen afterwards has nothing to do with the authority.

Senator Tremblay: If Bill C-3 was to provide an increase of those estimates from $872 to $900 million, you would not have the authority; you would therefore have to obtain it through a supplementary budget or something of the kind.

Senator Frith: It is the same thing with any bill, you cannot avoid it; it is a possibility.

Senator Tremblay: This is why I asked you whether it was based on the assumption that the bill will be passed or on the present state of the matter?

Senator Frith: It is the budget introduced by the minister after taking Bill C-3 into consideration, I am sure.

On the motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1984-85

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-28, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1985.

● (2140)

He said: Honourable senators, Appropriation Bill No. 1, 1984-85, provides interim supply for the first three months of the new fiscal year. This is a request usually made at this time each year.

We have already adjourned the debate on second reading of Appropriation Bill No. 4, 1983-84, dealing with last year's estimates. What we are now looking at is financial year 1984-85. As honourable senators know, these estimates are immediately referred to two committees: one of the House of Commons, and the other our Standing Committee on National Finance. While those two committees are studying these estimates, the government is asking for interim supply in order to cover necessary expenses between now and the end of June, when it is hoped that a final appropriation bill will be presented.

The appropriation bill before us contains $10,359 million of voted items which are required to meet government expenditure requirements to the end of June, while these estimates are being reviewed by the various committees. A second appropriation bill, which will be No. 2, will be tabled prior to June 30, 1984, to secure release of the balance of these estimates.

As usual, what is being asked for is three-twelfths of all votes, that is, for the months of April, May and June, plus certain additional proportions for some 45 votes. The additional proportions are required mainly to meet payments of a seasonal nature in some programs; to meet payments in accordance with certain agreements and the need in other instances to make major payments before the end of June.

There are two important conditions to my request to honourable senators to support this bill for interim supply. The first is that in no case is Parliament being asked to pass the entire amount of a vote, even proportionally. The second point is that the form of the bill is the usual one asking for interim supply.

I pause here in remembrance of Senator Grosart, since he always very carefully insisted that an undertaking be given to the effect that the passing of a bill of this type would not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize any item in the estimates when it came up for consideration in committee. The usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

[Senator Tremblay.]

Honourable senators, that leaves two matters which are customarily given attention at this stage. The first is to remind honourable senators that the bill before them contains in its schedules the details of the items being asked for for three months, and, in some cases, as much as six, seven and eight-twelfths are being asked for. In no case is the government asking for interim supply for the whole amount.

I am prepared to answer any questions honourable senators may wish to ask. If Senator Phillips will be speaking on behalf of the opposition on this bill, which I expect he will be, I have attempted to obtain information with respect to the usual details as far as the three-twelfths are concerned. However, he does not usually ask questions about the three-twelfths; he might have questions, as other senators might have, concerning the additional appropriations. With respect to that point, I have asked to be briefed on that aspect and I have some information on the subject.

Honourable senators, the last matter I wish to deal with is to ask leave to have printed as part of my presentation certain schedules which Senator Phillips and other senators often ask for in order to prepare their interventions.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before Senator Frith moves the adjournment motion, I would like to ask a question with respect to the order of business for tomorrow. Will Bill C-21, the borrowing bill, be up for second reading tomorrow? If so, where will it appear on the order paper; will it be the first item after Question Period?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not anticipate that we shall receive the borrowing authority bill. I made an inquiry with respect to it and I do not think we shall be getting it this week.

Senator Roblin: Thank you, that was my point.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, since Senator Roblin has inquired, I expect that we will continue with second reading of the two appropriation bills tomorrow. I do not know of another order which will be debated. However, there may be others.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 4 p.m.

EL SALVADOR

ELECTIONS—PRELIMINARY REPORT OF CANADIAN OBSERVER TEAM

San Salvador, March 26, 1984

INTRODUCTION

In response to the invitation by the Government of El Salvador, the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs decided to appoint observers to the Presidential elections on March 25. The role of the observers was to report to him about the fairness of the elections and whether or not the elections were conducted responsibly within the context of generally recognized democratic suffrage.

Our mandate was to observe and report upon an electoral process and not to make assessments or judgements about the internal political situation in the country. Messrs Gould, Fil-leul, and Fairweather, assisted by Miss Howell and assisted by Mr. Mayne of the Canadian Embassy in San Jose, Costa Rica visited a representative number of polling stations in the Western and Eastern region of the country and also in the capital, both before and during election day. Without exception our freedom of movement was unimpeded, including unscheduled last minute changes in plans to visit voting places in outlying communities. During a visit to the headquarters of the central electoral council the observers were briefed by officials about the process for conducting the vote and reconciling the results using a sophisticated computer system. The results are to be verified by Deloitte, Haskins and Sells, an internationally recognized firm of chartered accountants and management consultants.

THE VOTING SYSTEM

The foundation of the voting system for this election was a development of a new voters list of all persons 18 years of age and over. This was developed working with all available birth and death records from 1900 to February 27, 1984 and cross-checking these records with the 1982 voters list. In doing so duplication of names of both living and dead persons were eliminated from the old register and the new list containing about 2.47 million names was arrived at. Each of these names had a registration number which was the number of the person valid (cedula) or identification documents which contained his/her picture, fingerprints and places for placing a validation stamp at the time of voting.

Voters lists were prepared and arranged numerically in the three main voting categories. At the "municipal" level (261 locations) all cedula issued in the various municipalities were listed. At the departmental or provincial level (28 locations) the voters list comprised all the municipal list in that departmental area, and at the national level (16 locations) complete voters list including all municipalities and departments were included. The concept was that if a person was not living in the municipality where his/her cedula was issued, he/she could vote at the departmental level, and if he/she was not living in the same department—such as a displaced person—he/she could vote at the national level. In total 7,000 voting tables with ballot boxes—each box providing for a maximum of 500 ballots—were to be provided in these 305 locations.

To avoid multiple voting, once a person had voted, his cedula was stamped accordingly and his finger dipped into ink which could not be removed for at least 72 hours.

Although the new voters list contained about 2.47 million names this included persons who were not living in El Salvador (approx. 550,000) those living in areas of conflict where voting could not be carried out (approx. 100,000) and the armed forces (approx. 40,000) who were not permitted to vote. As a result, the forecast maximum number of voters was estimated at 1.8 million.

FOCUS

There was clear evidence of extensive effective motivation and commitment on the part of election officials to develop a "fool proof" voting system which would discourage and prevent fraud to the greatest degree. However, in attempting to achieve this objective, so many checks and balances were introduced in the system that its actual administration at the "grass roots" level became overly complex. This combined with a serious lack of logistical administrative planning and of training and leadership at the polls resulted in serious disorganization and confusion—especially during the opening hours at the polls—and in some cases throughout the day. At the "grass roots" level the extensive effort of local officials to resolve the difficulties and the patience and commitments of the population—some of whom stood in line in extremely hot and humid weather for hours on end (up to 10-11 hours)—in order to exercise their right to vote was clear evidence of the extent of the commitment to the electoral process of the greater part of the population. Few Canadian electors would have been so patient in similar circumstances. The atmosphere at the voting points, as assessed by the Canadian observers, was therefore positive in most respects, and this impression was reinforced by the fact that no visible attempts were made to coerce or influence the choice of voters. This comment applies equally to voting officials, party representatives and military guards. The latter were stationed at the entrance to polling stations or immediately outside, but in no cases close to voting stands.

Every vote we saw cast was done in such a way as to be impossible to see how the ballot was marked. Thus the integrity of the ballot appeared to be as total as had been intended. While the organizational overkill described above undoubtedly hampered the voting process and reduced the number of ballots cast, it did produce the bonus of balloting which was largely or almost entirely protected from fraud. Scattered incidents of fraud of which we heard were not so extensive as to inhibit or prevent the people from exercising their franchise. As we believe that most of the difficulties encountered so far were of an administrative nature, given our impression of the high level of commitment on the part of officials involved, we foresee it will be possible to adjust the system so as to resolve many of the more serious problems that arose.

We would not wish to minimize the very serious deficiencies which we observe and which were reported to us. These did have a significant impact on the smooth running of the election process and resulted in the disfranchisement of some thousands of voters. However, until final official figures on the result are available we cannot provide a specific judgment on the extent to which these factors effected or distorted the overall results. However, if the number of votes exceed one million, it will be our conclusion that the results of the election broadly reflect the wishes of the people of El Salvador. At the time of writing, it is generally anticipated that a second round will take place in 4-6 weeks time.

R. G. FAIRWEATHER, F. M. FILLEUL AND R. A. GOULD

With respect to this final paragraph, the observer team will report to the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs their final judgment when the overall results have been released.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 28, 1984

The Senate met at 4 p.m., the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

PRIVATE BILL

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS LIMITED—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Wednesday, March 28, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill S-10, intituled: "An Act to amend the Act of incorporation of United Grain Growers Limited" has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, March 15, 1984, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. BARROW
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to, and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1983-84

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-27, intituled: "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1984".—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, this is the third set of supplementary estimates that we have had for this fiscal year and, as has already been pointed out, the total is $5,832,502,744. You may think that supplementary estimates are not a large item in the federal budget. Last year there was a deficit of $30 billion, and supplementary estimates (A), (B) and (C) accounted for 20 per cent of that deficit.

Last evening Senators Doody and Roblin dealt at length with one of my favourite topics, the Canadair fiasco. Both honourable senators gave thorough explanations of the problems past, present and future. Senator Frith, complete with sound effects—and at times I thought I saw a few strobe lights, too—attempted to defend the position of the government on that matter.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He did the best he could.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It was a bad case.

Senator Phillips: It is difficult to defend pouring $3.5 billion down the drain. That is what it amounts to when the loan guarantee, the equity and interest are taken into account. It amounts to $3.5 billion being poured down the drain.

But Senator Frith must have felt a little twinge of conscience—and I never saw him exhibit that before—because he admitted that there were problems and he dissociated himself from the optimistic and arrogant view exhibited by the minister responsible for the CDIC. I must tell him that I appreciate that attitude and hope we see more of it from him in the future.

Senator Roblin in particular referred to the fact that the new Gulfstream IV and the Falcon 900 jets are now on stream and that the Challenger will have to be modified to meet the sales competition from those two aircraft. I was pleased to hear that the committee recommended that there be no further government expenditures with respect to modifying the Challenger without parliamentary approval.

One point that was overlooked last evening was the fact that Canadair has been reduced in its capacity or, as they like to say, has been "retrenched". The company originally was tooled to produce 80 aircraft per year; that has been reduced to 30 aircraft per year; and now they are hoping—just hoping—to sell 15 aircraft per year. The company is working at 20 per cent of its capacity and has approximately 40 per cent of its work force employed. Normally, a situation such as that would cause me some concern; however, in this case I say, "Thank God," because we cannot afford to have that company working at full capacity.

We have subsidized the Challenger to such an extent that I am afraid one of these days our trading partners are going to complain to GATT that we are dumping the thing on the foreign markets.

Last weekend in Toronto, at a gathering of the Liberal leadership hopefuls, the Minister of Justice stated that the government had no place in the boardrooms of the nation. I wish he had told that to his cabinet colleague several years ago, because we would have saved $3.5 billion.

The Minister of State responsible for the CDIC has come up with a rather novel, perhaps unique and almost fraudulent method of solving the debt problem of Canadair. The new company receives the assets, if any, and the old company, without any means of repaying the liabilities, assumes the staggering debt of that company.

● (1610)

I have tried to see the logic of this situation. If Senator Frith, who admits that he is a learned and intelligent individual, maintains that there is logic in this, I should make an effort to see it. Senator Austin, who says he is a five-star genius, can see the logic. I have tried very hard, honourable senators, but, unfortunately, I am among the 99 per cent of Canadians who can see no logic in that regard.

I am often pained, hurt and even discouraged when I hear my three colleagues who are cabinet ministers being described as "the three stooges." I think that description is rather unfair and unkind because they do have an influence. They must have had an influence in establishing Canadair.

Senator Olson, you may recall, was at one time a member of the Social Credit Party.

Senator Asselin: Was he?

Senator Phillips: I am thinking now of the description of the late Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, who said that he did not believe in interest until he bought his striped trousers. Senator Argue also visited the tailor, and he crossed over but continued to advocate public ownership. Now we have the public ownership and the interest-free grants given to Canadair. Well, at least two of the three are exercising some influence.

Last evening I heard Senator Frith ask who wanted Canadair.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Make us an offer.

Senator Flynn: One you can't refuse.

Senator Frith: If it's a good one, we won't!

Senator Phillips: I am reminded of a conversation that took place when I was in the other place. There was a rather tall individual nicknamed "Tiny," who was an MP from the Toronto area. Tiny Cathers was advocating to Howard Green one day that we should be selling off certain crown corporations. Howard said to him, "Why would you want to sell those? They're making money." Tiny looked at Howard and said, "My God, Howard! Don't you know you can't sell a business unless it is making money?" I wish someone would tell that to Senator Austin when he talks about privatizing Canadair.

I have tried applying to other situations the financial philosophy that was developed in this case. In fairness, it has some rather interesting possibilities. Take the case of a farmer who owes the Farm Credit Corporation half a million dollars but cannot repay it. Now, if he can afford the legal fees, all he has to do is set up two corporations, and he can have one corporation for the farm and all the liabilities and he can hold the other corporation for himself, sell the cash crops and keep the income, because, after all, the money came from the Farm Credit Corporation which, in turn, got it from the taxpayers. It is exactly the same situation as exists with the CDIC, for which Senator Austin is responsible.

The same situation applies to a fisherman. He can set up a corporation for the purchase of his boat and a new corporation for himself. The boat can pay the loan off; he can sell the fish and keep the income. The mortgage holder with a home purchased through the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation can do the same thing. Why should he be strapped with monthly mortgage payments when he can set up two corporations, the old company for the home and a new company for the individual living in the home?

I decided to try to carry that policy through to its logical conclusion, that is, if you can carry an illogical procedure through to a logical conclusion. The national debt will total $200 billion at the end of this fiscal year. At a rate of 13 per cent, the interest on that is $26 billion per year, which, incidentally, honourable senators, is almost the amount of our deficit. I thought: Why not do the same thing as we did with Canadair—transfer the national debt to the CDIC so that we will pay no interest and save one out of every three tax dollars collected?

I am rather reluctant to make that suggestion to the Senate because Liberal leadership candidates are all looking around for new programs, and I am wondering which will be the first to adopt this proposal.

Senator Flynn: Were Senator Olson running, he would.

Senator Phillips: I noticed that Senator Olson is offering his support to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, so it is quite possible that he will pass that suggestion on to Mr. Chrétien later today.

Senator Flynn: He will have time to reflect.

Senator Phillips: Last evening reference was made to the Post Office item in the supplementary estimates. The explanation given is that $170 million is for infrastructure costs relating to cultural mailings. Honourable senators, normally I think about an infrastructure as being roads and communication systems. I wondered if the Post Office was building roads, but I decided that they could not be because they would never get them completed; they would never get the asphalt laid. I decided that "infrastructure" must mean something else. I asked myself how many cultural mailings would require an expenditure of $170 million and how many magazines would come under the heading of "cultural mailings."

Recently, Post Office lobbies have been converted into centres for goods being delivered by Consumers Distributing, a company which imports and sells an awful lot of inexpensive goods. It imports them from various countries, so the thought occurred to me that the use of the term "cultural mailings" means that the outlook of Canadians is being enlarged because goods from Hong Kong and various other low-labour-cost countries are being purchased.

Honourable senators, I would not want to pass over the supplementary estimates without referring to the Department of Justice, vote 1c—$1.670 million for operating expenses. However, the most interesting part is that provides nb19 man-years, which is $88,000 per man-year. I know there are a great many Liberal candidates who want to find a safe haven before an election is called, and I am wondering whether the Department of Justice is being opened up for these people. No one ever gets a salary of $88,000 except a defeated Liberal candidate, so that must be where these people are going.

The restructuring of the Atlantic fisheries is mentioned. Honourable senators will recall that there was some urgency to complete this item. The Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, as it was then known, was calling committee meetings at midnight because we had to have this corporation in place to save the Atlantic fisheries.

About a year and a half ago, the Japanese developed a technique whereby they could take a cheap fish, Alaska pollock, shred it and treat it with egg-white and flavouring and then press it into the shape of a scallop or a shrimp, and I believe now they are producing lobster meat and crab meat in the same fashion. These products sell at half the price of the natural fish, and this product is now being imported into Canada. I shall give you one guess as to who is importing it: National Sea Products, the company which the federal government invested in so heavily in order to keep the fisheries going. National Sea Products is importing this artificial or synthetic fish to compete with an already depressed industry in Canada. Sometimes one wonders whether the government really knows what it is doing. They are the major shareholder in National Sea Products now; they appoint directors to the board of directors; and they told us at the time that they had every possible control of the company they would need. Now we find that National Sea Products is importing synthetic lobster to compete with Senator Bonnell's plant.

I notice that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans vote also contains an item of $2,670 for the Kirby Task Force. I have noticed Senator Kirby with a very contented smile in this chamber, and I always thought he was contented because he was in this chamber. Now I realize that he is smiling because he is getting his back pay and his back expenses for that royal commission.

The Agriculture vote 15c requires some explanation, I think. We find that $45 million of the previous vote was unused, and then there is an item for some $86 million under the same heading. I wonder if the sponsor of the bill could tell us why we have two votes, one increasing the amount paid under the Agricultural Stabilization Act and another reducing the amount paid under the act by $45 million. Perhaps somebody is trying to create the impression that they are voting more money.

External Affairs vote 11c is not a very big item. It is the payment of $17,280 (U.S.) which, in January of this year, required $21,514 (Canadian) for payment. Since then, the value of our dollar has gone down, and I would ask the government to hurry and pay that item before we have to vote another supplementary estimate on it.

The Energy, Mines and Resources vote 20c is in the amount of $49.5 million for oil pricing and compensation. I find this rather interesting because oil prices in Canada have increased—certainly at the gasoline pump; it costs the consumer more—and oil prices internationally have declined. Yet, we find the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources asking for a further $49.5 million.

Senator Frith: I am sorry, what is the vote?

Senator Phillips: Vote 20c. Surely, that department must have had some idea of what was happening in the international market with respect to oil prices?

The Canadian Transport Commission, vote 1c: $725,000 operating expenses. As honourable senators will recall, the present Minister of Transport removed the passes for airlines, a concession previously enjoyed by members of the Transport Commission. I am wondering if $725,000 will go to pay for the trips that commissioners and their wives take to delightful spots like the Caribbean and Hawaii.

Honourable senators, I would like to be able to say that this is the end of the estimates for 1983-84, but, unfortunately, no one can say that, because of the size of the deficit and the high interest rates Canadians will be paying for years to come. The 13 per cent interest on that deficit will continue to be paid by our children and their children in respect of the estimates for 1983-84, including the supplementary estimates before us today.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I remind honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, one of the recurring enjoyments of presenting and dealing with what is essentially a pretty dull business—although an important business in large figures—is the fun that Senator Phillips always has with the appropriations bills. On behalf of other senators, I want to say that we appreciate the fun that he has and we enjoy that with him. He uses these occasions as a sort of tremlin for various comments on taxes and general observations, usually directed to the performance of the government. In most cases, his reviews of government performance are not what in show business would be called "rave reviews".

I would like to cover a couple of points raised by Senator Phillips. However, since I am, of course, properly limited to reply at this state, I do not want to re-start what was an equally enjoyable debate last night.

Senator Flynn: Are you referring to your speech?

Senator Frith: I certainly enjoyed making it. Whether it, in turn, would get rave reviews remains to be seen and will probably never be known.

The first point I would like to make is that I thought I heard Senator Phillips say that at some point I had dissociated myself from some positions taken by Senator Austin, the minister in charge of Canadair. If I did that, it was not with any intention to dissociate myself from Senator Austin or his position. In fact, what I was attempting to do was to present my understanding of his and the government's position on Canadair and de Havilland and, in particular, my understanding of why the government was required to answer the question of what should be done and whether, in effect, the industry should be saved, and, if so, how we should do it. We saw last evening that there were differences of opinion on the answers to those questions.

● (1630)

As to the question raised about the $170 million on infrastructures for cultural programs for the Canada Post Corporation, I am still unable to give any further detail, but I understood Senator Doody to say last evening that Treasury Board officials had undertaken to give more detail to the committee on that matter.

Senator Asselin: Senator Guay asked for more detail.

Senator Frith: Yes, and I explained to Senator Guay last evening that the Treasury Board officials had undertaken to give a detailed explanation regarding the infrastructures for the cultural programs, and that seemed to satisfy Senator Guay for the moment.

I doubt very much that the information will satisfy any expectations Senator Phillips has with respect to the building of roads, but we will have to wait and see.

The question of the Atlantic fisheries was explained to the committee, and, so far as I am able to understand, all of the questions raised by Senator Phillips with regard to vote 15c under Agriculture, vote 40c under Energy, and vote 55c with respect to the Canadian Transport Commission, were answered in the committee. The answers to those questions can be found by referring to supplementary estimates (C) and the report of the committee.

I, therefore, ask honourable senators for their support on second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to, and bill read third time and passed, on division.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1984-85

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill C-28, intituled: "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1985".—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I found the last budget to be most confusing, but this appropriation bill is even more confusing.

Senator Frith and I have had discussions concerning clause 2(b) of the bill. What was intended to be $127 million has, through a typical typographical error, turned into $12 million. I leave that to the disposition of the Senate. We can pass the bill in its present form or have it corrected.

In his remarks last evening Senator Frith gave us the usual assurance that interim supply would not restrict a senator's right and privilege to question any of the expenditures listed in the estimates. I think it would have been more appropriate had Senator Frith reminded honourable senators of their responsibility to conduct a detailed examination of the estimates. A detailed examination of the estimates is especially essential this year because the government is persisting in its determination to destroy the Canadian dollar and the Canadian economy. The Grits seem to love the unemployed, and the more unemployed they can create, the more loving they become. That seems to be their philosophy.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Your imagination is running away with you again.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators should take a look at some of the disturbing aspects of the government's spending. The federal government is spending $12 million an hour, every day and every night. I understand that Royal Assent is scheduled for this evening, and if the usual pattern is followed, there will be a reception held in the Speaker's quarters afterwards. If honourable senators can last for an hour at that reception, the government will have spent $12 million; if they can hang on for two hours, the government will have spent $24 million, and that should just about sober up anyone.

This is the time of year when Canadians file their income tax returns. When the Canadian taxpayers are calculating their taxes, I hope they recall that one-third of their income tax goes to pay interest on the national debt. Currently, the government is running ahead of its budget. There is a toll-free number one can call to obtain information—biased information, of course, because it is the government's viewpoint—on the budget. If the government is doing that for the budget, why not have a toll-free number so that taxpayers can ask how much of their income taxes go to pay interest on the national debt? I think that that would be a far more busy line than the one listed for budget information.

Senator Olson: Ask that question and you will receive an answer.

Senator Phillips: I mentioned in my remarks on the previous order that by the end of this year the national debt will have reached $200 billion. Honourable senators, when John Turner and Pierre Trudeau started deficit financing, the total debt was only $17 billion, but since then the debt has taken off far faster than the Challenger ever has.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You will have to explain that.

Senator Phillips: We are all familiar with the weekend habit of Liberal M.P.s visiting their ridings and handing out cheques which they expect eventually to turn into votes. One of these days I hope that some Liberal M.P. will be honest enough to deliver part of the funds by cheque and the balance by way of an IOU, because the government is spending $1.50 for every $1 it collects. So, if an M.P. is handing out $6,000 over a weekend, he should give a cheque for $4,000 and the remaining $2,000 by way of an IOU. He should tell his constituents that the government has not collected the $2,000 yet.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That will come in due course.

Senator Phillips: Yes, it will come sometime down the road.

Honourable senators, I am an impartial observer of the Liberal leadership race. I enjoy listening to the news comments, but I do not have any real favourite. I do not dislike any one of them enough to wish them success, because one would really have to hate someone to hope that he inherit this mess.

I am surprised at the wisdom the candidates display out on the road and how that dims when they get into the cabinet chamber, because they all have different views out on the road from the ones they have here on Parliament Hill.

The Minister of Justice, one of the earlier candidates, advocates reform of the government's economic policy. If it is working as well as the Leader of the Government in the Senate has said, why would the minister want to reform it? He further indicated that he does not like deficits and that they have to be eliminated. I wonder where he was when this budget and the previous budgets were approved. I have checked through earlier Hansards and I cannot find any indication that he ever opposed even one deficit budget. He didn't even condemn one, let alone oppose it, but now he does not like this budget—and, frankly, I don't blame him.

● (1640)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Whom are you talking about?

Senator Phillips: The Minister of Justice.

[Senator Phillips.]

Senator Olson: You have to be careful about that interpretation.

Senator Asselin: These are the facts.

Senator Phillips: I should now like to refer to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the candidate with the Social Credit campaign manager. He also is disturbed by the size of the deficit. Yet, if we look at the budget for his department we find that there is $8.1 billion for petroleum incentive grants. The forecast for 1986 is $12 billion. It seems a strange way of trying to reduce a deficit, having a 30 per cent increase in a two-year period. As some of you will recall, he was also a Minister of Finance. I know that Senator Olson does not like to recall this, but when Mr. Chrétien was Minister of Finance his budgets had deficits. He has now changed and reformed, and that must have something to do with the good influence of Senator Olson.

The Minister of State for Economic Development does not like deficits either. He says that they are ruining the economy. I did not know that anyone in the other place listened to me, but I am quite pleased that every Liberal candidate agrees with me that deficits grow out of proportion, and I give them credit for listening to me. The Minister of State for Economic Development goes one step further, because he questions universality; he is going to remove the benefits of family allowance and old age security for the Prime Minister. But, when I heard that the Prime Minister had lessened his duties yesterday, I thought that that would teach him a lesson and that he would not take away the family allowance and the old age pension at the same time.

Two of the other candidates, John Roberts and John Munro, do not like deficits either, but they are really not in the running. In golf tournaments they refer to these people as the rabbits. They are just there competing for the sake of competing.

Mr. Turner has really benefited from his exile, because he says that he knows firsthand from experience now what deficits do for the economy. He has seen the wreckage his budget and succeeding ones have caused, but he is now reformed and he is going to have a balanced budget.

Mr. Axworthy does not want a deficit and he is supporting Mr. Turner. Herb Gray, the President of the Treasury Board, is supporting Mr. Turner and he does not want a deficit. Mr. Regan, the Minister of State for International Trade, does not want a deficit either and he is also supporting Mr. Turner. Even the minister of the slush fund in Quebec, Mr. Ouellet, is supporting Mr. Turner.

Senator Flynn: If there is someone from Quebec supporting Mr. Turner, it must be him.

Senator Phillips: Mr. Ouellet does not want a deficit either. That leads me to the following questions. Who is supporting this budget? Who approved the budget in the first place? There are only two people I can think of, and they are the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, because everybody else seems to be opposed to deficits and, therefore, opposed to this budget. I find it rather strange that, although so many people in the other place voted for the budget, since that snowstorm in February they have all suddenly changed their viewpoint and now agree that we should not have a deficit. It is unfortunate that I missed that snowstorm, because it must have been a real humdinger.

I was rather disappointed that the Minister of Finance did not enter the race. Then I realized that he could not be a candidate, because, while all the other candidates are opposed to deficits, he was the one who introduced three of the biggest deficits we have ever had.

There is a very interesting aspect to this opposition to deficits. I am assuming that the Prime Minister will resign shortly after the new Liberal leader is elected. I hope that he will not be like Mackenzie King and stay until the fall; but, going on the basis that he resigns before June 30, what happens then, honourable senators? We will then have a leader who has repudiated the budget and does not like the deficit, so he will have only one alternative—namely, a new budget. Why approve this budget, when we are going to have a new one in June? Of course, that could have certain benefits. At the moment we do not know whether the Canadian dollar is going to sink or just go down part way. It certainly is not floating. The change in the rate of the dollar is very expensive to the taxpayers. The Bank of Canada has made a life preserver out of million-dollar bills and is trying to keep the dollar up with that. We cannot afford to do that forever. A new budget might help bring the dollar back up to the 80 cent level where the Minister of Finance has said that it should be.

You may think it rather odd to mention the unfortunate drop in the dollar in respect of the estimates, but, if the dollar goes down, in adverse proportion, so do interest rates and inflation. The federal debt is so huge that the government is hit hardest by increased interest rates. It is no longer only the farmer, the fisherman and the homeowner who are affected, because now the government is in such a mess that it cannot raise the interest rates without upsetting its own estimates. That makes these estimates irrelevant, because interest rates are going up.

Some of the items set out in the bill call for six-twelfths and eight-twelfths of the year's supply. There is no need for any item going beyond June 30. With a new leader there will be a new budget. Let us give supply to the end of June to accommodate the present government, and then we will hear what the new Prime Minister has to say. I am sure that he will want to reduce these estimates in order to balance the budget.

An interesting thought occurred to me when I was preparing these notes. In that the House of Commons is not listed among those establishments receiving any more than three months' supply, am I correct in understanding that the House of Commons will not exist after June 30, and that that is why it is only receiving three-twelfths of its supply? I would ask the sponsor of the bill to indicate whether the House of Commons is going to be dissolved at the end of June or whether we will receive a new budget. I would prefer dissolution, because Canadians want dissolution and because that way we would have a new budget and I would get both my wishes in one throw.

● (1650)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, again with an appropriation bill before us, we have the opportunity to hear philosophical pronouncements on the approach of the government and the approach of the opposition on some of these financial matters. We are pleased to know that, apparently, according to Senator Phillips, that group of influential persons who listen to him is growing wider and wider. On these occasions we are always glad to have an opportunity to hear the problem-solving approach the opposition takes to these questions, as expounded for us by the Senate economic opposition guru, Swami Phillips.

Senator Olson: He speaks for the opposition.

Senator Flynn: In the same way as Senator Frith speaks for the government.

Senator Frith: As Senator Phillips has said, I agree that the undertaking does give rise to a duty for senators and members of Parliament generally to examine carefully the estimates when they come along. The very reason for asking for interim supply is to give the committees an opportunity to do that.

Since there are obviously some basic philosophical and practical differences between the approach of the opposition and the approach of the government to some of these questions, let me briefly explain what I understand the government position to be. It is quite true that members of the government, including those in the leadership race, are against deficits and are concerned and worried.

Senator Asselin: Except Mr. Chrétien.

Senator Frith: I think there is no question that at the time the budget was introduced the minister himself said that the size of our deficit and, because of its consequential effects, the size of the United States deficit are of great concern to this government. However, it is not possible to have it both ways. Senator Phillips speaks of the deficit and attempts to slay that dragon by setting it up, but he drops the challenge and turns to the question of jobs, not making the irresistible and inescapable connection that a reduction of the deficit, as it presently stands, is going to have a very serious effect on jobs.

At the same time, he also overlooks the basic principle—and this is a philosophical difference—that Liberals find they can come forward with a program or programs and be proud of their record while never being satisfied that they cannot do better.

Senator Flynn: I can understand that.

Senator Frith: That is right. Senator Flynn and Senator Asselin understand that, but I am not so sure that Swami Phillips understands it. The philosophy of the Liberal Party is that it is never satisfied and that there is always room for improvement. It is interesting that, over the years, not only Senators Flynn and Asselin have understood that. The people of Canada, by returning Liberal governments more often than any other, apparently also understand it.

Senator Flynn: The only problem is that they have no memory.

Senator Frith: Just because the people of Canada do not vote for the Conservative Party, it does not mean that they do not understand that the Conservative Party agrees and understands that the Liberal Party always feels, no matter how well it does, it can always improve.

Senator Flynn: There was a big lie about the price of gas.

Senator Frith: If the fact that the people of Canada have elected Liberal governments more often than Conservative governments is a lot of gas, then there is a lot of gas in the history books. Perhaps we can do something about that to bring down the cost of natural gas.

Honourable senators, with reference to the added proportions and the question of interest rates, of course the Government of Canada is concerned about the rise in interest rates, but the government position and, I think, the truth—as I think all Canadians understand—is that at the present time there is no real domestic reason for interest rates to be rising. We have an excellent trade surplus; an economy performing not as well as the Americans' but certainly improving; and there is no domestic economic reason for the interest rate to be rising.

If it is possible to have a domestic interest rate policy that is totally divorced from the pressure of American interest rates, then I suppose we will hear from the opposition, but they are not going to tell us what that solution is until they are elected. They are not going to tell us what they would do about Canada, de Havilland or the whole aircraft industry. They are not suggesting any kind of program; they are keeping their coat totally buttoned up and are saying nothing about what they would do, until they are elected. Then, we say to the people of Canada, it will be too late.

Honourable senators, there are reasons for all the added proportions—that is, going beyond the three-twelfths. Although there are individual explanations, in all cases, the reason is that undertakings and commitments have been made that require the voting of interim supply to cover a period beyond the three-twelfths. If honourable senators have concern about any particular item, I do have an explanation for each additional proportion that goes beyond the three-twelfths.

On the question of why the House of Commons is not asking for an additional proportion, my information is that in no case had it made commitments of the type requiring additional proportions. I suggest that Senator Phillips should not draw any inferences about the dissolution of Parliament from the fact that the House of Commons is not asking for an additional proportion.

Honourable senators, I ask for support of this bill on second reading.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government. I am disappointed that he cannot give any assurance regarding June 30. I will settle for dissolution or a new budget.

He seemed to be attempting to create the impression that the deficit is there to create jobs. When the accumulated deficit was $17 billion, 328,000 were unemployed. At the end of this fiscal year the accumulated deficit will be $200 billion, and we have two million unemployed. Can he honestly demonstrate how the deficit is helping the unemployed?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there are two aspects to that question. In the first place, I did not say that the deficit is in place for the sake of jobs, but I could have. The fact is that a good portion of the deficit is for the approximately 400,000 jobs that have been created by this government. What I did say, and stick by—and what, on examination, I think Senator Phillips will have to agree to—is that if a sharp cut in the deficit were taken now, it would have an effect on jobs and would increase the number of unemployed. That is a fact. It is also a fact that a good portion of the deficit is there for the specific purpose of job creation, and it is succeeding in doing that.

● (1700)

Senator Asselin: When it goes one way, it is your doing; when it goes the other way, it is the fault of the Americans.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to, and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

OTTAWA

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

28 March 1984

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 28th day of March, 1984, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be
Sir,

Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière

Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that Order No. 3 be adjourned until the sitting of the Senate on Tuesday next, April 3.

With respect to Order No. 5, I do not know whether Senator Flynn is intending to proceed today.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, not today.

Senator Frith: Senator Macdonald, am I right that all the orders down to Order No. 10 stand?

Hon. John M. Macdonald: That is correct.

Senator Frith: With respect to Order No. 11, honourable senators, I ask that that order be adjourned in the name of Senator Anderson, if that is satisfactory.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Then all remaining orders stand.

Honourable senators, I now move that the Senate do adjourn during pleasure, to re-assemble at the call of the bell at approximately 5.45 p.m.

Hon. Daniel Riley: I wish to point out to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate that the House of Commons division bells are now ringing. What will happen if the vote takes place beyond 5.45 p.m.? Will we proceed with Royal Assent at that time, in any event?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, obviously they are calling their vote earlier than normally is the case, since usually they call the vote at 5.45 p.m. I was told earlier today that the vote today and tomorrow in the House of Commons would both involve a 15-minute bell. In that event, they should have their vote completed in time for Royal Assent.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

POSTPONEMENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor

General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne:

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that house that:

It is the desire of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General that they attend him immediately in the Senate Chamber.

The Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

At 6.45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.
The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod having returned from the Commons:

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore addressed the Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

I am advised that the sitting of the House of Commons has been suspended until tomorrow.

The Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(l)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, March 29, 1984, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am advised that the opposition in the other place, through its whip, has told the government whip and the government house leader that they will not be voting today on the question before them, which question, I believe, relates to the borrowing authority bill. That is why the sitting has been resumed without Royal Assent having taken place.

I am also informed that the vote is not likely to take place until 11.15 tomorrow morning. The bells have actually stopped ringing in the other place, but are deemed to be still ringing.

Therefore, we have an agreement with the other place that we will endeavour to have Royal Assent to Bill C-27, being Appropriation Act No. 4, 1983-84, and Bill C-28, being Appropriation Act No. 1, 1984-85, at approximately 12.45 tomorrow afternoon. It is in order to allow the committees that have scheduled meetings for tomorrow morning to hold those meetings that I suggest we adjourn until 12.30 p.m., to have Royal Assent at 12.45 p.m. We can then resume our sitting at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, if we so wish.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, that is a scenario that is quite likely to be the correct one. However, I point out that it was the Speaker of the House of Commons who decided that the bells will ring again tomorrow morning. It is his decision that forces us to adjourn until tomorrow morning. I agree that we can adjourn until 12.30 p.m. tomorrow and have Royal Assent at that time, because at that time the House of Commons will be in a position to receive the Messenger of the Deputy Governor General. The point is that it is not necessarily the fault of the opposition whip that they will not vote until a quarter to eleven tomorrow morning. It was their Speaker who decided that.

Senator Frith: Yes, that is quite correct. I was not attributing fault. I was merely stating the fact that the opposition whip did inform the government whip and the government house leader that they would not be voting this evening. As Senator Flynn has said, it may be that they will not be voting tomorrow either. We will find that out before we send anyone down to see them tomorrow.

This has resulted from the opposition whip's saying that they will not be voting today, but, as Senator Flynn has said, the actual decision about the bell was made by their Speaker and not by the whips.

That is the reason, honourable senators, why this unusual proceeding has taken place.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I observe that there are some luncheon meetings of some importance set down for tomorrow. The Canada-U.S. group is due to meet at 12.15 p.m. The members of Committee III are required to attend. I agree that that means only three or four senators, but a change in the hour of sitting of the Senate tomorrow does disrupt those meetings.

What is the advantage of meeting at 12.30 rather than at 2 o'clock, and having Royal Assent at any time thereafter?

Senator Frith: It is because, honourable senators, it is normal for us to have Royal Assent 15 minutes before the other place adjourns, which means that we have Royal Assent at either 12.45 p.m. or 5.45 p.m., and in this case I have chosen 12.45 p.m.

I think we will manage to muster a sufficient number of senators for Royal Assent, despite the fact that the members of the Canada-U.S. group will be absent. I am sorry that this arrangement disrupts their plans, but we will try to get along without them.

Senator Hicks: I am devastated to think that the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate can get along without me, but I have to admit that he is probably right.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 12.30 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 29, 1984

The Senate met at 12.30 p.m., the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.
Prayers.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Roland A. Ritchie, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker:

The Honourable Lloyd Francis, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bills:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1984.

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1985.

To which bills I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bills.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, April 3, 1984, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I simply want to put on the record that we have no questions today. There would have been one on the sports pool but Senator Perrault is not in a position to reply at this time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That does not mean we would have been at a loss for an answer.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You may be sure I will have some next week.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the second to ninth reports of the committee, reporting Bills S-2 to S-9, inclusive, without amendment.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, would it be appropriate to have these reports dealt with en bloc?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall these bills be read the third time?

On motion of Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc, bills placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

APPEARANCE OF PROVINCIAL MINISTERS OF HEALTH BEFORE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, I should like to make the following announcement. At 4 p.m. tomorrow, in room 250 in the East Block, history will be made in that while conducting a pre-study of Bill C-3 the committee will hear from the following: the Honourable David Russell, Minister of Hospitals and Medical Care, Alberta; the Honourable James A. Nielsen, Minister of Health, British Columbia; the Honourable Charles Gallagher, Minister of Health, New Brunswick; the Honourable Gerald Sheehy, Minister of Health, Nova Scotia; Mr. Gerald White, Director, Health Policy, Newfoundland; the Honourable Keith Norton, Minister of Health, Ontario; the Honourable Albert P. Fogarty, Minister of Health and Social Services, Prince Edward Island; the Honourable Pierre-Marc Johnson, Minister of Social Affairs, Quebec; the Honourable Graham Taylor, Minister of Health, Saskatchewan; and the Honourable Andy Philipsen, Minister of Health and Human Resources, Yukon Territory.

I would ask all honourable senators, if they have time, to attend that meeting so that they can meet the ministers and welcome them to the Parliament of Canada where, for the first time, they will all gather together to give their views on this important piece of legislation.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What provinces will not be represented?

Senator Bonnell: The Province of Manitoba will not have representatives at the meeting tomorrow because the Minister of Health for the Province for Manitoba appeared before the committee last week.

Senator Flynn: The room that the meeting is to take place in is what was at one time called the "Summit Room," is it?

Senator Bonnell: The meeting will be held in room 250 in the East Block.

Senator Flynn: That is the same room.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, that was room 257.

Senator Flynn: I thought it would have been more appropriate, in the circumstances, to hold that meeting in room 257. Is that because Senator Graham would not allow us to use his room?

Senator Bonnell: We are meeting in room 250 of the East Block so that all the ministers can sit on one side of the table and senators on the other, thereby allowing us to face each other.

Most of the ministers will have officials with them. In fact, there will be approximately ten officials from Ontario, five or six from Quebec, four from Saskatchewan, and so forth.

Since this is a very important piece of legislation and has to do with provincial jurisdiction, it is appropriate that they appear before our committee.

Senator Flynn: I thought a round table would have been more appropriate.

Senator Bonnell: It is as round as we can make it.

● (2010)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I cannot resist pointing out that in the last session I had a motion before the Senate that was not formally agreed to, although I expect to reintroduce it. That motion provides that it be a general policy that a Senate committee, when considering something which, in its opinion, is of special interest to a province or provinces, should, where practicable, invite representatives of such province or provinces to appear before it. I am delighted to see that invitations were sent and that such splendid results have been achieved in this case and that provincial representatives are appearing.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Bonnell. I thought I heard him mention the Honourable Pierre-Marc Johnson, Minister of Social Services for Quebec. What is the latest information he has?

Senator Bonnell: The latest information I have is that the Honourable Pierre-Marc Johnson, Minister of Social Affairs of the Province of Quebec, will be here at 4 o'clock tomorrow.

Hon. R. Arthur Tremblay: If Senator Thériault will permit me, I rise to make a small correction to the title of the minister, Pierre-Marc Johnson. A few weeks ago, of course, he was the Minister of Social Affairs, which portfolio includes health, but since that time he has been appointed Minister of Justice and, at the same time, Minister of Federal-Provincial Affairs. I suppose he is coming in two capacities—that of former Minister of Health and that of Minister of Federal-Provincial Affairs. Although that is just a small correction, it might be worth taking note of.

[Senator Flynn.]

MARITIME DEFENCE

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, April 5, 1984, I shall call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canada's Maritime Defence," tabled in the Senate on June 15, 1983.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

SPORTS POOL

ATHLETIC CONTESTS AND EVENTS POOLS ACT— FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. In spite of the 1979 agreement between the provincial and federal governments on lotteries, whereby the federal government surrendered to the provinces the entire jurisdiction on lotteries in return for a certain amount paid such year by the provinces, the federal government has passed legislation to set up an Olympic lottery.

Such legislation would apparently be inconsistent with the 1979 federal-provincial agreement and this is the reason why the provinces will question that new federal legislation before the courts. The provinces have also sent under protest the money to be refunded twice a year to the federal government.

In spite of the challenge by the provinces as a result of the federal decision to infringe in a field of provincial jurisdiction, will the federal government wait for the decision of the court before it starts operating that Olympic lottery?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Asselin has partially answered the question he asked when he advised the Senate that the matter had been referred to the courts for an interpretation. I want to be extremely careful because of the admonition that we do not comment on matters that are before the courts.

Senator Asselin: I am not talking about the substance of the matter.

Senator Olson: I understand that.

Senator Asselin: I am asking about the decision the government is going to take.

Senator Olson: I believe that Senator Asselin asked whether or not a reference to the courts is tantamount to an injunction to cease the process of setting up a sports pool. I would want to check that out. I have had some discussion on this matter, and my view is that it does not. However, I have no intention of commenting on what the court has been asked to decide—namely, to give an interpretation of the agreement signed by the federal and provincial governments. I do not think it is a matter of federal or provincial jurisdiction per se.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think the leader has misunderstood the question. It is not what is going to happen in the case before the courts but whether the government intends to consider other practical solutions aside from the court decision.

Senator Olson: That is a slightly different interpretation of the question. The question was whether or not the government intended to proceed with the proposed sports pool legislation or action. I would like to check that out. As I said a moment ago, I do not believe that the reference to the court is tantamount to an injunction against action that is under way.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Is it true that the sports betting pool has already hired its staff, and has also opened offices in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal?

[English]

Senator Olson: It is true that some personnel have been retained or hired to administer the sports pool. Indeed, some office space is either in the process of being or has already been acquired. I am sure that some of that space is in Ottawa. I am not sure how much, if any, is in Toronto or Montreal, but I shall check.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have heard also that the baseball commissioner intended to oppose the federal legislation and that Mr. Olivier, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport was supposed to meet with him yesterday for the purpose of discussion or negotiation. Could the Leader of the Government find out from the Minister of State what have been the results of his discussions with the baseball commissioner?

[English]

Senator Olson: I will be happy to ask the minister to consider the proposal. I shall reply to the question in the way it was put. I am not sure that the minister will reveal all of the discussions, because that may not be proper.

Senator Asselin: You may use my terms.

Senator Olson: Of course.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senators Murray and Roblin on March 22, 1984, concerning statements by the Governor of the Bank of Canada regarding interest rate developments. The answer is fairly long and I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Governor of the Bank of Canada has been quoted as saying that a higher rate of increase in wages in Canada relative to the United States is one of the chief reasons for rising interest rates in Canada. The Governor made no such statement; and, moreover, this assessment of the upward pressure on Canadian interest rates is not held by either the Bank of Canada or the Department of Finance.

As has been made clear on a number of occasions, there is no upward pressure on Canadian interest rates emerging from purely domestic developments. Private sector borrowing in Canada remains restrained and the banking system remains in a very liquid position. Inflation performance continues to be very good and trade performance has been excellent. These factors are supportive of a stronger dollar and an easing of interest rates. However, because Canada is an international trading country, foreign economic developments often impinge on our economy and our economic policies. This is particularly true with respect to interest rate movements.

U.S. interest rates have been increasing in recent weeks in response to the uncertainty in that country about future interest rate levels. This concern has been caused by the size of U.S. government deficits at a time of rapidly growing private sector credit demand in the U.S. The Federal Reserve Board has maintained a cautious stance and capital markets have, therefore, anticipated higher rates to emerge as a consequence. In response to these expectations, speculative pressure has been brought to bear on the Canadian dollar and, despite the continuing improvement in Canadian inflation and our excellent trade performance, the dollar has fallen against the U.S. currency.

The increases in Canadian interest rates that we have seen over the past weeks have reflected the policy of resisting undue downward movements of the dollar arising from speculative pressure that might have inflationary consequences.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill S-11, to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Tunisia, Canada and the People's Republic of Bangladesh, Canada and the United Republic of Cameroon and Canada and the Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka, an agreement between Canada and Kenya and conventions between Canada and the Arab Republic of Egypt, Canada and the Republic of the Ivory Coast and Canada and Sweden for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to be able to present this bill, which is a series of tax treaties relating to the elimination of double taxation involving a number of nations, a procedure which is recognized, well known and well studied by this body. It is a lengthy bill of about 175 pages.

Allow me to digress for a moment. I read recently that the Lord's Prayer took 56 words. I notice the Leader of the Opposition has suddenly perked up. The Ten Commandments took 297 words. The Declaration of Independence has been compressed to a mere 300 words and, as a matter of interest, the speaker who developed this particular theme was talking to a food conference in London when he pointed out that the European Economic Community's directive on the exporting of duck eggs required 26,911 words. I have made a rough calculation, and I think this particular bill has about 70,000 words.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: They must be goose eggs.

Senator Buckwold: These are the chicken eggs.

Just so that honourable senators are not frightened by this particular introduction, members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and honourable senators are well aware that much of the bill is repetitious, in the sense that there is a treaty outlined for each of the nations.

The purpose of the bill is to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Tunisia, Canada and the People's Republic of Bangladesh, Canada and the United Republic of Cameroon and Canada and the Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka, an agreement between Canada and Kenya, and conventions between Canada and the Arab Republic of Egypt, Canada and the Republic of the Ivory Coast and Canada and Sweden for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

As a matter of interest, I phoned the department to find out why the word "convention" is used in all instances except in the one between Canada and Kenya, which is an "agreement"—assured that someone, astutely, on the other side would ask why this was the case—and the response was that they are really the same thing, but that in dealing with some countries—not very many—the word "convention" is not really part of their vocabulary, and the accepted compromise is to use the word "agreement." I can assure honourable senators that they mean the same thing.

The bill also contains, in Part IX—and I think this will be of real interest to the Senate—an amendment procedure which establishes rules for the implementation of future amendments to the conventions. With respect to that procedure, the Governor in Council is authorized to declare, by order, that any future amendment to a convention is approved and has the force of law in Canada when the order comes into force.

Essentially, this method of amending conventions involves three stages: first, the Order in Council introducing the amendment shall be laid before each house of Parliament; second, an order laid before a house of Parliament stands referred for a period of 30 days to such committee of that house as may be designated or established by that house for the purpose. However, if a committee of a house of Parliament to which an order is referred produces a report on the order, no motion for concurrence in the report may be moved in that house. Finally, an order laid before a house of Parliament shall come into force on the thirty-first sitting day after the order has been laid before both houses of Parliament or on such later day as is specified in the order.

Honourable senators, that is a complicated way of saying that under this particular bill, Bill S-11, amendments to these conventions or agreements may be made by an Order in Council with both houses being advised of the order and being able to refer it to committees. However, as I read the matter, the committees would not have any influence on the final determination as to whether the order goes into effect.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Unless they can persuade the government otherwise.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, unless they can persuade the government otherwise.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): How do you persuade the government?

Senator Buckwold: They always listen to me.

Senator Flynn: I know; that worries me.

Senator Buckwold: I believe that this particular item in the bill is a matter of concern to the Senate.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: On which page is that?

Senator Buckwold: It is on page 8.

Senator Flynn: Clause 29.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: The first thousand words.

Senator Buckwold: Clause 29. I draw this to the attention of honourable senators because we have had similar legislation proposed in the past, and it certainly merits close study in committee. This is a Senate bill and I am sure the committee will review with interest the direction that is being taken in this particular legislation. I felt that I should draw this to the attention of honourable senators because, in some way, it involves a change in general principle. I feel that I have probably expounded sufficiently, and I am sure that the subject will be well discussed in due course.

Senator Flynn: Enough to raise our interest.

Senator Buckwold: The reason I mentioned it early in my speech, senator, was just so that honourable senators would listen to the rest of my speech. The eight tax conventions under review follow the general pattern of the conventions previously approved by Parliament, and I am sure honourable senators are well acquainted with them. The convention with Sweden, when in force, will replace the existing agreement signed in 1951. When all of the conventions are ratified, the number of Canadian tax treaties in force will increase from 32 to 39. We will then have 39 treaties with an equal number of countries around the world.

I should now like to indicate briefly the main elements of these tax treaties. Generally, dividends may be taxed in the country of source at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. In the case of Sri Lanka, the 15 per cent rate will apply only to dividends paid out of profits arising from new investment. In the case of Cameroon, a general rate of withholding tax of 20 per cent will apply.

I point out to honourable senators that, although basically these agreements are the same, there are details that change from country to country as they have been negotiated by the department. A general rate of 15 per cent—20 per cent in the case of Cameroon—is provided in the case of interest paid to non-residents. However, certain types of interest—for example, interest paid to a central bank or to the Export Development Corporation—will be exempt in the source country.

With respect to royalties, the conventions provide for a general rate of 10 per cent in the source country, except that in the case of Kenya, Egypt and Tunisia the rate is set at 15 per cent. In the case of royalties arising in Cameroon, the rate is 20 per cent. The rate of 10 per cent in the convention with Sri Lanka will apply only to new technology.

Some of the other matters also dealt with in this bill include capital gains. The treaty provision dealing with capital gains reflects the standard Canadian position enabling the source country to tax gains arising on the sale of real property, business assets and shares in real estate companies. The absence of an article on capital gains in the tax treaty with Cameroon does not affect the right of Canada to apply its domestic legislation.

Under the heading “Non-Discrimination” under the conventions, discrimination on the basis of nationality is prohibited, thereby ensuring nationals of the one country equal treatment with nationals of the other country in the same circumstances. However, this does not prevent a country from providing fiscal incentives—for example, the small business deduction—on the basis of the residence of the taxpayer. The convention with Ivory Coast does not contain an article on non-discrimination and consequently the rules of the domestic legislation will apply.

Under the heading “Teachers”, no special consideration is provided for foreign teachers in Canada. Thus, the two-year exemption provided for under the 1951 agreement with Sweden will be terminated.

With respect to pensions, Canada has preserved its right to tax pensions paid to residents of the countries included in this bill.

• (2030)

With respect to double-taxation relief in Canada, double-taxation of foreign-source income of Canadian residents is alleviated by way of a foreign tax credit in accordance with the limitations provided in the domestic legislation. In addition, for a company resident in Canada, dividends received from the exempt surplus of its foreign affiliates will be tax exempt in Canada.

The conventions with Tunisia, Bangladesh, Cameroon, Kenya, Egypt and Ivory Coast contain a tax-sparing provision. “Sparing” is an unusual word, but that is what I am told is the name of the provision under which the tax incentives granted by the domestic legislation of those countries will be recognized in computing the Canadian tax.

On balance, the terms of the tax conventions provide some equitable solutions to the various problems of double taxation existing between Canada and these countries. Each of them hopes to implement the bilateral tax convention as soon as possible, and, consequently, I commend this bill to the Senate for favourable consideration.

Honourable senators, that concludes my introductory remarks. I know all of you have followed closely the simple arguments I have made, and I look forward to having this matter discussed in perhaps even more detail by those who speak on it in the Senate and especially in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which, I hope, the bill will be referred.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I would like to ask the honourable senator a question. You referred to the fact that regulations passed amending a treaty would be referred to a committee, but that the committee had no power, and, if it reported, there could not be any motion in concurrence. Could you explain the purpose of referring the regulation to the committee when nothing can be done about it?

Senator Buckwold: The purpose of the referral is to make both houses aware of the Order in Council and also to give them an opportunity to look at it. Again, as has been pointed out, if by some chance the government can be convinced to do otherwise, then that opportunity is there. However, to me the purpose of referring it to the committee is to ensure that it is not buried under some regulation which most people would not be aware of.

Senator Godfrey: The previous tax treaty bills approved by the Senate had a provision for disallowance of these regulations. With respect to the last bill, I can recall that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce found some fault in the actual procedures, but finally did approve a revised procedure providing, if I recall correctly, for disallowance. Why is there not such a provision in this bill? Why have they departed from that practice and instituted this meaningless procedure of referral to a committee instead of the disallowance procedure as in all the other bills?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, in response I can only tell you that that is exactly why I took some pains to point out at length to honourable senators what was in this legislation. I am sure those questions will be asked of the department and senior officials when the bill is in the committee stage.

Senator Godfrey: I have one final question. There was a matter that was discussed in detail in the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee with respect to the last bill, and that was with respect to a provision recommended by our committee which was, incidentally, not accepted by the government in the end. That provision was that, by regulation, the government could not increase the taxes of a Canadian citizen. I think I am right in saying that there is no such provision in this bill and that, by simple regulation and not by act of Parliament, the government could, in effect, increase the taxes in Canada. I am wondering if I am correct in that respect.

Senator Buckwold: I would have to agree with that. Certainly, as I look at the bill, I see no limitations. While it is not likely that that will happen, nevertheless that is not the way the implementation of new laws and regulations will be looked at.

This is a question that I know will concern some honourable senators, because it could possibly lead to taxation without proper authority. I am sure if it lowered taxation, there would be no problem, but if taxes were thereby increased, I am sure questions would be asked. However, I am sure that the department would give—

Senator Flynn: What kind of questions would be asked? It would be ultra vires.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, that may well be an angle that should be investigated.

Senator Flynn: If it causes an increase, yes.

Senator Buckwold: However, that is not to my knowledge. Although I am proposing and supporting this bill, I am nevertheless well aware of this particular section and the questions that will be asked by honourable senators with respect to the issues you have raised.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, can the Deputy Leader of the Government assure me that this is not a money bill, that it does not give the power to tax?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): A number of interesting constitutional points have been raised thus far, particularly the last one posed by Senator Thériault. As Senator Godfrey has said, similar issues have arisen on a previous occasion in the Senate with respect to a similar bill. I think we should do our best to clarify these points with respect to this bill.

I must say that with his usual candour Senator Buckwold has exposed the bill's warts and all so that we can see some of the points which struck him as being curious. I thank him for that, since I am sure more than one of us finds them a little odd, to say the least.

Senator Thériault: I thought I had very quietly and kindly asked a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government. I wonder whether or not I will receive an answer.

Senator Roblin: I took the silence as indicating there was not an answer to be expected right now; however, if there is let us hear it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, before a bill is introduced in the Senate as an S-bill it is our custom to obtain an opinion from parliamentary counsel with respect to whether or not it is a money bill. I assume that consultation was carried out in this case. However, I have not seen the opinion. I will check into the matter.

Senator Thériault: I must say I am rather surprised, because, as I listened to the answer given by Senator Buckwold to Senator Godfrey, I understood that there was the possibility that the passage of this bill could increase taxes. If my understanding of his response is correct, then I deduce it is a money bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe the purpose of the bill is to avoid tax, not to increase it. That is to say, avoid double taxation in the countries party to the convention. That is the purpose of this bill and that is why I assume it is not a money bill. However, I revert to my first answer in this respect. I understand Senator Thériault's concern and I will look into the matter. Certainly, before we ask for second reading I will obtain the information requested.

Senator Roblin: Just to finish off a very brief excursion into this esoteric realm, I think Senator Thériault has made an excellent point, because, undoubtedly, taxes can be raised by the device of an Order in Council, if the agreement between Canada and another country calls for an increase in the withholding tax. It seems clear to me that it can be raised. If that is the case, then the question as to whether or not this bill should be introduced here is moot.

Senator Frith: If that is so; however, I do not think it is.

Senator Roblin: Even if it is decided that in its form here it is not a money bill, I can easily foresee that an Order in Council coming down in the House of Commons, presumably in the first instance, and then in the Senate, could very well increase taxes. If we increase the withholding rate between Canada and another country then that affects revenue and it is an increase in taxation. One would have to wonder at what stage the message from His Excellency the Governor General could be introduced. I think that is one of the points which could very well be clarified.

Incidentally, it seems to me that these are policy questions. I hope we will not have some departmental official fobbed off on us, much as I respect bureaucratic expertise. We might be happier if the minister were there.

I would particularly like to hear the rationale not only with respect to the question raised by Senator Thériault and others, but the rationale with respect to the reference for an Order in Council to both houses of Parliament. If it is purely for information, goodness knows we receive that in little slips of paper which come around every day—a pack of them that high! If one had the stamina to wade through them, I dare say one would find it out. However, if it comes to Parliament by way of information sent to a committee which can do nothing about it, then it seems to me that such a process is of very doubtful utility.

I would like to know why it is adopted. I would like to know why they abandoned the principle that, as I think Senator Godfrey correctly stated, was enshrined in previous bills of this kind by which the tabling of the Order In Council in either chamber was subject to debate and for validation or otherwise. As I remember, the last time we were left out of that process somehow or other, and Senator Godfrey's point was that we should be put back into the cycle of events. I certainly agree with that. It seems to me that we need an explanation as to why this peculiar and, so far as I know, new procedure has been introduced and the former one, which was relatively satisfactory, has been abandoned. These are policy questions and I hope the minister comes to answer them and that he has a convincing explanation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on the first point, whether it is a money bill or not is not a policy question but a constitutional one. The purpose of the bill is to avoid taxation, not to increase or impose taxes. On the second point, any Orders in Council have to be made within the ambit of the purpose of the bill. Therefore, if any regulation or Order in Council is made, there would only be power to do so if it were within the scheme of the legislation, which is to avoid taxation and not to impose taxation. However, we are going to look into those two points.

Senator Roblin: That is highly debatable.

Senator Frith: I do not think it is, but that is a matter of opinion. Those are the questions we have to raise and it seems to me that, prima facie, those are the answers that we can look for.

On the third point—and the reason Senator Buckwold raised it is the very argument Senator Roblin advanced—we do want to look into this formula, which, insofar as my experience is concerned, is new and gives less scope to Parliament than any of the formulae we have seen up to now, which are the ones for negative and positive resolutions. I hope that the committee will look into that. On that point I share the concern of Senator Roblin and other honourable senators.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the following question: Does that bill have implications on provincial taxation both for corporations and individuals?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I believe that the minister should answer that question. I would guess that, if there is a reduction in a tax treaty, it does involve the taxes that might be levied at a provincial level as part of the overall federal-provincial tax arrangements. That is my personal opinion without being a tax expert, but I think your question is a very good one and should be referred to the minister.

Senator Tremblay: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Perhaps there is no problem for provinces which have an agreement with the federal government for the collection of their taxes, but there are provinces which do not have agreements; for instance, Ontario, Alberta and Quebec. In that case would they be free to have their own scale, if I may use that expression, whereas the other provinces whose taxes are collected by the federal government would have another scale?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, this is the thirty-ninth tax treaty. Up to the present time we have had approximately 31 which have met with the approval of the provincial taxing authorities. I assume that those regulations are well in hand and the arrangements have been made between the provinces and the federal government for the sharing of those taxes.

Senator Tremblay: That is exactly what I should like clarified. Were there agreements before the conventions came into being and the bill was prepared?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I believe that these questions require more consideration before we invite the Senate to pass this bill. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1984-85

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-21, to provide borrowing authority.

He said: Honourable senators, I suppose this is properly called the annual borrowing authority bill. I have seven points to mention consisting of approximately a paragraph each, so I should fall well short of the number of words in the bill that we have just been considering. The seven points are: first, the legal setting of the bill; secondly, the connection between the bill and the budget; thirdly, the change from the original bill as presented in the other place regarding the non-lapsing contingency; fourthly, the reasons for the non-lapsing contingency provision; fifthly, how this bill deals with that; sixthly, why honourable senators will be asked for reasonably speedy adoption of this bill; and, seventhly, the status of last year's borrowing authority.

Honourable senators will note on the first point, the legal setting, that in order for the government to continue with its regular debt program to raise new funds to meet the financial requirements, the Financial Administration Act stipulates that statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament. What is being asked for here is not the appropriation of funds but the authority to borrow. That is why, in the course of debating these bills, we speak of the word "authority" rather than the granting of funds, because the authority to borrow is given and is used up in various ways by bond issues and by other kinds of borrowings, as we have learned in the past, especially in detail before the Committee on National Finance.

The context of the bill with relation to the budget is that the amount of authority being requested is related to the financial requirements as set out in the budget. Any questions relating to borrowing authority, therefore, are properly and advantageously examined in light of the earlier debate on the budget and the information on the government's fiscal policy supplied with the budget.

The recent budget of the Minister of Finance projects financial requirements for 1984-85 of $25.5 billion, excluding foreign exchange transactions. This amount is roughly $1.5 billion less than the estimated requirement in the 1983-84 fiscal year. The decline in financial requirements reflects an acceleration in the growth of budgetary revenues, a slower growth rate of budgetary expenditures and a small decline in the net source of funds from non-budgetary transactions.

Honourable senators may be aware that there was a change in the amount from the original bill as presented in the other place, and it related to the non-lapsing contingency. In view of these financial requirements, clause 2(1) of Bill C-21, as originally drafted, sought borrowing authority for fiscal 1984-85 of $29.5 billion. That amount was equivalent to the $25.5 billion of financial requirements set out in the budget, plus a non-lapsing contingency amount of $4 billion to be carried forward for use in fiscal 1985-86. However, as honourable senators are no doubt aware, the government agreed to amend this clause so as to provide $24.5 billion of borrowing authority for fiscal 1984-85. Thus total borrowing authority available for 1984-85, after passage of this amended bill, will amount to $24.5 billion.

Clause 2(2) of the bill states that any unused portion of the $24.5 billion being requested, to the extent that it exceeds $4 billion, will be cancelled on March 31, 1985. As I mentioned earlier, the government agreed to reduce the total borrowing authority request to $24.5 billion, thereby giving up the original request for a non-lapsing contingency amount.

I should now like to move to point four of the seven points and explain to honourable senators why the original request was important and why it is important to have a non-lapsing contingency in place.

In the mid-1970's, when new borrowing authority was sought by way of appropriation bills, a non-lapsing contingency amount was always included. Likewise, in more recent years when borrowing authority has been sought by way of special bills, as is the practice today, a non-lapsing contingency amount has also been included. Recently, the contingency amount has been in the order of $4 billion. This amount is intended to cover contingencies only. It does not permit spending beyond what has been approved by Parliament or has been given on-going authority by acts of Parliament. Examples of the latter are UIC benefits, public debt charges and transfers to provinces. The contingency amount is largely designed to cover two special situations of critical importance: the need to accommodate the impact of large and unpredictable foreign exchange operations on the financial requirements; and to ensure that the government will be able to continue its regular debt program if Parliament is not in session or has been dissolved. In the case of foreign exchange operations, either upward or downward pressure on the Canadian dollar can give rise to the use of borrowing authority. In the case of downward pressure, official holdings of foreign exchange are depleted, creating a possible need to undertake foreign borrowings. That is what the contingency is there for, because it is hard to know what directions the pressures are going to be in, but if they are downward the contingency is there to permit the government to undertake foreign borrowings. In the opposite case, foreign exchange is acquired through the sale of Canadian dollars, thereby adding to the cash requirements.

Clause 3 of the bill is designed to help eliminate any uncertainty regarding the length of time non-lapsing amounts should remain outstanding. That is why clause 3 provides that any unused borrowing authority carried forward from previous fiscal years shall expire either on April 2, 1984 or when the Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85 comes into force, whichever is the later date. It is intended that once new borrowing authority is obtained for the 1985-86 fiscal year, any remaining unused portion of the non-lapsing amount would be cancelled. The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance can take credit for the fact that this approach has been taken, because two or three years ago that committee raised the issue and questioned the practice of automatically having these non-lapsing carry-forwards.

Honourable senators, why I shall be asking you to deal with this bill as expeditiously as possible is as follows: Without borrowing authority, the government cannot increase its outstanding debt to raise funds to meet the financial requirements. The government has entered the new fiscal year with very little borrowing authority—and what is being asked for in this bill is borrowing authority—and that authority gets used up during the year. The borrowing authority that was granted for 1983-84 is mostly used up and, therefore, the government is entering this fiscal year with very little borrowing authority left. Given the level of financial requirements, it is essential that the government be able to continue to carry out its debt program in an orderly and efficient manner. When I say I wish this bill to be dealt with as expeditiously as possible, I do not mean that the committee has to meet this evening; Thursday will be sufficient.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Tomorrow would be better.

Senator Frith: The government, like any responsible corporate borrower, must be in a position to conduct its borrowing operations without timing constraints. In this way, it is possible to take advantage of market opportunities so as to minimize overall debt charges. In view of the size of the financial requirements and the relative size of the government's debt operation, timing is of critical importance.

Government of Canada securities currently outstanding total more than $140 billion, and the financial requirements are such that the level of outstanding debt will increase by about $2 billion every month. In addition, maturing debt has to be refinanced. In these circumstances, any disruptions in the on-going borrowing program may lead to undue stress in the capital markets, putting upward pressure on interest rates. This would result in higher debt charges for the taxpayer and higher borrowing costs for individuals and businesses.

Given the size of the government's financial operations, even a saving of a small fraction of one per cent involves significant dollar amounts. Because of the relative importance of public debt charges in total government expenditures, it is the primary goal of the government to minimize such charges. This goal can only be achieved if ample borrowing authority is always available so as to ensure flexibility and that the large borrowing operations of the government do not interfere with those of other levels of government or the private sector. We have a collective responsibility to see that the goal of minimizing public debt charges is vigorously pursued.

Also, honourable senators, I might note that the first quarter of each fiscal year is usually a period of particularly heavy seasonal cash requirements because of tax refunds and other factors. Such a cash drain may be financed by market borrowings. Thus, it is especially important that the government has borrowing authority in place to enable it to carry on with its regular debt program.

Honourable senators, I should like to give you a short report on the status of last year's borrowing authority. The total amount of authority provided for 1983-84 was $26.7 billion, which was equivalent to the financial requirements projected in the April 1983 budget. This borrowing authority consisted of $2 billion non-lapsing authority carried forward from the Borrowing Authority Act 1982-83 (No. 3); $14 billion from the Borrowing Authority Act 1983-84; and $10.7 billion from the Borrowing Authority Act 1983-84 (No. 2). Of this amount, domestic borrowing operations have used all available borrowing authority; $12.5 billion through the issue of treasury bills, $8.5 billion through the issue of marketable bonds, and $5.7 billion through net sales of Canada Savings Bonds.

Honourable senators, I ask for your support of this bill on second reading. If the bill receives second reading, it is my intention to ask that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, as is our habit and tradition in the case of such bills. Although I have a briefing book, it may be that many of the questions honourable senators may have on the subject can be more satisfactorily and precisely answered by departmental officials who will appear before that committee. I suggest that the bill be referred to that committee under the distinguished—and are not the chairmanships of Senate committees always distinguished?—chairmanship of the Honourable Senator Doody.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE VETERANS AFFAIRS EXPENDITURES IN ESTIMATES—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my purpose in introducing the motion that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the expenditures pertaining to veterans affairs set out in the estimates is to give us the opportunity to continue the thrust that the committee began three or four years ago in examining the various aspects of the legislation pertaining to veterans affairs. There still remain, in both the Disability Pensions Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act, half a dozen or so anomalies which require continuous monitoring, particularly in light of the changing conditions for veterans as time goes on.

One serious problem, which has arisen yet again, has to do with the adjudication of pensions and the building up of a backlog. This is of concern to all veterans organizations and, because of the aging of our veterans, it should be looked into immediately.

One part of the War Veterans Allowance Act which, to my mind, is unnecessary is the requirement that veterans who, for health reasons, are living in foreign countries must return to Canada for 365 days in order to qualify for a War Veterans Allowance. It seems to me to be a bit ridiculous, at this stage of the game, to require a veteran to leave his family for 365 days, even though he is entitled to receive a War Veterans Allowance as soon as his application has been approved upon his arrival in Canada.

There is a provision related to interest income whereby veterans are allowed an exemption of $100. I think it is time, in this day and age, that that exemption be increased to a reasonable amount. The suggestion is that $500 would be that reasonable amount.

There has recently been introduced the Aging Veterans Program—a very good program—whereby veterans on disability pensions can remain in their homes and receive treatment. In my view, it is now necessary to expand that program to include not only the disability pensioner but also the War Veterans Allowance recipient and others who have need of it. I would request that this matter be addressed immediately, again because of the aging of our veterans.

Due to the annual escalation of the cost of living index, the basic rate of pensions must be re-estimated every three or four years. This basic rate is based upon the six selected categories of the public service. As a result of annual escalation, the basic rate of the public service has now overtaken that of the war veterans by $600. It is time that something was entrenched in the legislation so as to circumvent the sort of constant review of the basic rate that is necessary for the war veterans to catch up.

I mention yet again to honourable senators the recurring problem that is manifested in unfairness to the wife of the deceased veteran, and reiterate the necessity to continue her pension at the married rate for a period of time so that she can adjust to the death of her husband.

Honourable senators, there are other, more minor matters which could be corrected but which I will not mention right now. I feel that, by referring the estimates to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, we could have the minister and other witnesses examine how these anomalies could best be corrected. I felt the necessity to move this motion because of our commitment to the war veterans of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may make a comment in moving the adjournment of the debate, I think that this is a good idea but I would like to have more time to look at it. I hope that we can dispose of it this week.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): How much longer?

Senator Frith: I repeat that I hope we can dispose of it this week.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is a fair offer.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—ORDER DISCHARGED

On the Order:

Consideration of a Message from the House of Commons requesting the establishment of a Joint Committee on Official Languages.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I intend to give notice of a motion, and consequently, I ask that this Order be discharged.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order discharged.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO ESTABLISH STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 44(1)(a), I give notice that at the next sitting of the Senate, I shall move:

That Rule 67(1) of the Rules of the Senate be amended by relettering paragraphs (e) to (n) inclusive as paragraphs (f) to (o) inclusive and inserting immediately after paragraph (d), the following as new paragraph (e):

“(e) The Joint Committee on Official Languages policy and programs, to which shall be appointed nine senators.”;

[Senator Marshall.]

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate agrees to unite with that House in the establishment of a Joint Committee of both Houses on Official Languages policy and programs; and

That the Senate will appoint nine of its members, to be designated at a later date, to serve on the said Joint Committee.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CANADIAN YOUTH

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hébert, seconded by the Honourable Senator Le Moyné:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Canadian youth between 15 and 24 years of age;

That the Committee be composed of 12 Senators to be designated at a later date;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than March 1, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, this order stands in the name of Senator Murray but, with the indulgence of the Senate, I would like to speak to it now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: I am sure that all honourable senators will join with me in commending Senator Hébert for moving the motion that a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Canadian youth between 15 and 24 years of age.

I would also like to take this opportunity to commend Senator Hébert for his involvement in the Katimavik program, which was applauded so widely during the deliberations of the Senate Committee on National Defence. An examination of the problems of Canadian youth is a worthwhile project—one in which I would like to participate with Senator Hébert and one which I support—but, honourable senators, we have to face some realities in terms of the procedures in this chamber. Honourable senators are aware of the problems that exist in this chamber with regard to the scheduling and manning of committees because of the lack of numbers. The Rules Committee, in its wisdom, reduced its membership of committees from 20 to 12, in order to alleviate the problem which particularly affects the ability of the opposition to contribute the numbers required to man committees. Furthermore, as I understand it, as a result of the fact that certain aspects of the subject matters of our committees required more emphasis as their degree of importance changed, the Rules Committee did two things: it added fisheries and forestry to the Agriculture Committee, to rightfully give more exposure to those two important subjects; and, similarly, new and important subjects were highlighted and added to the newly named committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, previously known as the Health, Welfare and Science Committee—namely, consumer affairs, fitness and amateur sport, employment and immigration and youth affairs, all very important topics in our country today.

It is my observation, too, that the decision to cancel Wednesday sittings of the chamber was taken in order to allow committees to meet on Wednesday afternoons without interruption. To my surprise and almost before the ink was dry on the new rules book, two motions were introduced or the intentions of same were addressed, in direct conflict with the purposes of the changes in committees' subject matters. The deputy leader let it be known that serious thought was being given to having a special committee on fisheries, which is fine. Strangely enough, I asked a number of times back in 1978 that a separate committee on fisheries be established and nothing happened, for reasons of which I was never made aware. I presume it was because we did not have the numbers to support another committee. Now, we suddenly find that this is not a problem any more. Senator Hébert has proposed a special committee on youth—which, I repeat, is a very worthwhile project. However, both these commendable motions defeat the purposes of the changes in the rules and conditions as they exist in the Senate. Senator Hébert's motion, which is the subject of this debate, could and should be referred to the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, under which the responsibility for youth affairs falls. Rule 66(1) describes the responsibilities of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee. It reads, in part:

The Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, composed of twelve members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred,—

The rule does not say "may be" but "shall be referred."

—if there is an order of the Senate to that effect, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to social affairs, science, and technology generally, including:—

And the rule goes on to list eleven subject matters which come under the umbrella of the committee, including youth affairs.

To further exacerbate the problem, a motion has been introduced by our good friend, Senator Watt, to appoint yet another committee, the subject matter of which also comes under the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee. In my opinion, that matter should also be referred to the committee. In addition, the leader gave notice of the formation of a joint committee on bilingualism, which will require more members from this chamber; I believe he said 9. Unfortunately, we are spread too thin now. If we take into consideration the likelihood of travel by the existing and proposed committees, the situation that exists is that the following committees are committed, with every justification by their mandate, to travel from place to place: Energy and Natural Resources; National Defence; Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry; and Transport and Communications—which means they could all be away in the next few weeks. If these proposed committees and their right to travel are approved, we could have another two or three committees travelling with not too many senators left in Ottawa or in this chamber.

Again, if we scan the rules book, it can be readily detected that there are at least 10 active committees, and with 12 members per committee, or 120 required to man them, or even considering a quorum of 4 for each one, we are spread just too thin to give reasonable representation. For example, last Thursday at the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee meeting, with witnesses who came all the way from British Columbia as well as representatives from Environment Canada, there were three senators in attendance, and two of those three senators had to leave in the middle of the meeting to attend another committee meeting taking place at 11 o'clock.

Far be it from me to discourage Senator Hébert in his first motion in this chamber. As I indicated before, I would love to sit on such a committee with him and I am sure that many others are interested. I sit on four committees, two of which are now or soon will be travelling. I would love to be on the Transport and Communications Committee, which will also soon be travelling or, indeed, has already left. I, too, would like to see other special committees formed to focus attention on the many problem areas in our country, such as the continuing problems of veterans and their wives, to name just one. There are countless other areas of concern we could be examining but, with the greatest respect, we cannot have a new committee formed for every special interest, however justifiable, particularly when the rules provide the mechanism to approach one's emphasis on an area of concern, as is the case with Senator Hébert's motion. Certainly, we must limit ourselves commensurate with our capacity to carry out our responsibility.

It is my intention to move an amendment to Senator Hébert's motion. Before doing so, I want to point out that I asked a question on this subject in the Senate on March 6. I asked whether the government intended to establish a task force to examine the youth unemployment problem. As recorded in Hansard at page 293, here is the government's answer:

Honourable senators, there are no plans at present to establish a task force to examine youth unemployment. The government has appointed a Minister of State for Youth who has responsibility for reviewing this issue as well as others affecting youth.

It is the intention of the Minister of State for Youth to undertake, in the near future, to meet with youth, youth organizations and our economic partners in order to gain a better appreciation of current youth issues and to encourage the active participation of the private sector in the search for meaningful resolutions to the labour market difficulties facing young Canadians.

The Chamber of Commerce has decided to go ahead on its own with a task force to study youth unemployment. Although the federal government will not participate directly, the Minister of State for Youth and the Minister of Employment and Immigration have encouraged the Chamber of Commerce to conduct its independent review and have offered support in the way of statistical data and background information from Employment and Immigration.

Despite that, I still believe that Senator Hébert's motion is justifiable but, as I have indicated, I do not think a new committee is the route to follow. Therefore, I move:

That the motion be amended in the first paragraph by

(1) deleting the words "a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed" and substituting therefor the following words: "the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized"; and

(2) deleting all remaining paragraphs.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, yesterday evening the Leader of the Government tabled a reply to some questions that Senator Roblin and I asked on March 22 concerning statements by the Governor of the Bank of Canada regarding interest rate developments.

I have now had an opportunity to read most of the reply that was tabled by the Leader of the Government. The first paragraph denies that the Governor of the Bank of Canada had ever made the statements attributed to him by the news media, and, naturally, I accept that denial.

However, the second, third and fourth paragraphs make certain judgments about the country's economic situation, the state of the dollar, inflation, and so on. I should like to have clarification from the minister of whether the sentiments expressed represent the view of the government or whether the reply is a statement purporting to come from the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will look into that. I understand the question clearly. I believe it is the view of the government, which, in this case, would be that of the Minister of Finance; but whether the reply represents solely the view of the Bank of Canada, I am not entirely sure, and I will have to confirm that.

MEETING OF MINISTERS WITH COMMISSIONER OF BASEBALL

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I am pleased to see Senator Austin back in the chamber. It has been a long time since we have seen him here, although I saw him on television last night. He was vacationing in New York City with his good friend, the Honourable Jacques Olivier, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Apparently the minister went there to meet with Mr. Bowie Kuhn, Commissioner of Baseball. I would like to know if he has any details to report to this house as to the negotiations he had with Mr. Kuhn, what the future holds for these negotiations, and whether he convinced Mr. Kuhn not to proceed with legal action against the federal government.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Asselin for missing me and for welcoming me with a question today. I did have an opportunity, along with my colleague, the Honourable Jacques Olivier, Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, to visit with the commissioner of major league baseball, Mr. Bowie Kuhn, in New York. We went to see Mr. Kuhn because he had made some public statements regarding his concern for our sports pool activities as they might affect major league baseball. We wanted to be in a position to tell Mr. Kuhn everything we could about our game of skill, and to assure him that the issues that were causing him concern were not real insofar as Canada is concerned. It is well known in sports circles that professional baseball had a gambling setback in 1919 when the Chicago White Sox were alleged to have thrown the World Series because some of its players were involved in a gambling arrangement on that particular sports event. The result was the establishment of the office of Commissioner of Baseball, which Mr. Bowie Kuhn holds.

We told him that, indeed, it was our intention to have a sports pool based on the skill of the participants in judging the scores of several games which would take place at the same time, and that in this way there is no opportunity for any arrangement. In other words, there would be so many events that it would not be possible to have a recurrence of that event of 1919.

We also pointed out to him that as the Sports Pool Corporation would be owned by the Government of Canada it would be operated in a fair and equitable way and would not make undue profits, although we hope it will make some profits. We told him that any illegal activity would be closely scrutinized by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or the provincial police force within the appropriate jurisdiction and that, therefore, we did not expect any access by criminal elements to these activities. Mr. Kuhn then told us he would take into account what we said and other concerns that we discussed, but baseball in the United States is a religion with the fans and the owners and they simply did not want to be put in a position where they even seemed to encourage gaming activities, lotteries or anything relating to chance, skill or whatever with respect to organized baseball. That is the official policy position. We told him that we in Canada love baseball, that the Expos and Blue Jays were marvellous features of our sports scene and that we wanted a franchise in Vancouver.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Blah, blah, blah!

Senator Austin: I am sorry that Senator Flynn does not take seriously the franchise in Vancouver.

Senator Asselin: He did not say that.

Senator Austin: Senator Asselin's question was of a general nature and I thought that he wanted as full and complete an answer as I could give. I want to be clear that we discussed with Commissioner Kuhn the question of a franchise in Vancouver and we told him that the Government of Canada was solidly in support of a franchise there. I asked him when and how the matter would be considered. He told us that a study had been launched by his office on behalf of the owners, who are the people who finally approve expansion of franchises, and that the results of the study would not be available until some time in early 1985. So there would be no decisions taken this year.

● (1410)

He also told us that the criteria for a decision with respect to the extension of a franchise was based on business considerations, such as whether or not the fans would be willing to come out, what the revenues and costs would be, and how well the franchise would do in business terms. He then said, "Of course, I cannot tell you what the owners might have in their subjective minds when they vote."

Senator Asselin: Why did you not take Senator Perrault with you to New York?

Senator Austin: Regrettably, Senator Perrault is not a member of the cabinet.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: Are you speaking for yourself?

Senator Austin: Yes, I very much regret that Senator Perrault is not in the cabinet. We were a very good team when we were together. Baseball was an important part of Senator Perrault's interests then. I want to say that Senator Perrault has been the leading proponent of baseball in British Columbia.

I visited New York in my capacity as regional minister for British Columbia and Minister of State for Social Development, within which envelope sports activities are located, and, in particular, to represent Vancouver's interests in the franchise throughout those discussions. As I was saying when I was most pleasantly interrupted—

Senator Flynn: We will do it again!

Senator Austin: I would enjoy it. We were told that they would have to defend their classic position with respect to any form of chance or skill gaming related to baseball, and that they would want to begin an action in order to protect their legal position against any accusations of erosion. I understand that an action was commenced today in the Quebec courts.

Senator Asselin: Did you inform Commissioner Kuhn of the litigation commenced by the provinces against the sports pool?

[Senator Austin.]

Senator Austin: He informed me. He was very well briefed. He knew all about the litigation in Canada. We told him what the opinion of the Department of Justice was and that we would defend ourselves in terms of any legal action.

In summary, as Commissioner Kuhn said, we had an excellent talk. We exchanged views frankly and in a friendly way. He is not changing his position with respect to his interests, nor are we changing our position with respect to our interest.

I wish to say that he was told we do not have a private system in Canada to assist with sports funding in the way that exists in the United States where there is a much larger and more diversified business community. He was told that in our opinion, and as approved by Parliament, the instrument of a government institution is necessary to raise and channel funds to all sports groups across Canada.

He said that one of the reasons for concern is that American states, particularly the State of New York, have conducted studies with respect to similar types of sports pool activities. In fact, there is a decision relative to the State of Delaware and the National Football League in which the State of Delaware won the right to proceed with a sports pool arrangement. However, it did not proceed because market studies indicated the State of Delaware was not large enough for commercial success. We have agreed to keep the lines of communication open in order to continue to discuss all these matters, always without prejudice, of course, with respect to whatever legal actions are under way. I hope that there will be an opportunity to resolve the differences at a later time.

TRANSPORT

CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: My question is directed to the Leader of the Government and it is prompted by an interesting article in a recent issue of the New York Times. The Minister of Transport was being asked about the extravagant expenditures for airports in Canada, and, according to this article, he concluded his comments with what I thought was a rhetorical question about the difficulty of building Taj Mahals and, at that stage, he made a reference to the Charlottetown Airport.

I would like the minister, who is a Chrétienite, to inquire from Mr. Axworthy, who apparently is a Turnerite, if this is, in fact, the reason why the people of Charlottetown have had to wait more than 15 years for their airport terminal, standing on one another's insteps in the interval. If this is the reason, it is not an example of lavishness, as far as Charlottetown is concerned.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie, who is a long-term member of Parliament in both this house and the other, knows as well if not better than I that it is improper to ask ministers to comment on newspaper articles. That is precisely what he is asking me to do, but, of course, I cannot comply. However, I would have to say that I think some of his attempts to relate certain things, as in the preamble to the question, are erroneous.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, to be more precise, I asked this minister to inquire of another minister who is not a member of this house as to the policy. I do not want his opinion of this article. I, personally, thought it was a very good article.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that may be and I respect the fact that that is the way the question is now put, but it was not the way it was put a minute ago. Then, I was asked to comment on the validity or otherwise of this newspaper report, and whether it is direct, or one step removed by asking another minister, in my view does not change the prohibition against the propriety of asking questions that are really a request for a comment on newspaper articles that are sometimes speculative. That is the only point I was making.

Senator Macquarrie: If I may say so, the minister must have been an editor at one time. He constantly puts the blue pencil through other people's questions. Sometimes I doubt his capacity to make these corrections. I would ask him to check the blues.

I am not interested in the minister's comment on the article. I asked him to make an inquiry of a fellow minister. Surely that is the reason why we have ministers in the Senate.

Senator Olson: I understand that, senator.

SPORTS POOL

SKILL OF PARTICIPANTS

Hon. C. William Doody: I have a question for Senator Austin. It is really a supplementary question to that of Senator Asselin, and a request for clarification.

In Senator Austin's reply, he described the lottery as a game of skill, and I was wondering if he could tell us whether it is an acquired skill or whether it is a hereditary or genetic skill. If it is an acquired skill, will there be schools set up so that Canadians can exercise this skill? Would we all start on an equal basis, or will some of us be at an advantage over others in the skillful pursuit that he is advocating?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): That is a very valuable question, Senator Doody. I cannot think of another question I would rather leap to answer.

I think that all Canadians should have an equal opportunity to participate in this game of skill which will be run by the Sports Pool Corporation. We have under way the establishment of a sales distribution system throughout Canada, including the province of Newfoundland. I expect that those who are particularly good with mathematics and who follow sports will probably have a good opportunity to exercise that skill to their advantage.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question. What about those people who will not have the skill? Will you arrange to prevent them from participating? In that case, it will be a lottery and will be covered by the agreement of 1979. Can the minister tell us whether that lottery or game of skill will be available only to people who have the required skill?

● (1420)

Senator Austin: The wonderful thing about being a Canadian is that we all have the opportunity to learn skills based on the exercise of our own personal sense of responsibility. Any kind of sports pool involvement is voluntary. The Canadian public decide whether to participate or not. If they do decide to participate, that decision must have been made on the basis that they think they have a special skill or a special aptitude in that regard.

If you think we should establish a risk-taking training program, I will be pleased to take that up with the Dean of the Harvard School of Business. I will ask him how they teach risk-taking training programs.

Senator Flynn: The reply the minister has just given indicates that he does not understand the conflict between the provinces, which claim the agreement of 1979 does not allow the federal government to enter into this new kind of game. Lotteries are purely and simply games of chance, and the argument put forth by the federal government is that one requires skill to participate in the sports pool. If that is the case, the sports pool will be aimed at those people who have that skill, and those who have no skill will be participating in a game of chance, just as if they were participating in provincial lotteries. If this sports pool is aimed at those who think they have a particular skill, I suggest that this sports pool will go bankrupt soon after it is established.

Senator Austin: I have too much respect for a former Minister of Justice to take that question with total seriousness.

Senator Flynn: I should not have put that question to you.

Senator Austin: But you did, and you must take the responsibility for that.

Senator Flynn understands very well that the principal issues in this case are now subject to judicial review, and I do not intend to enter into any form of legal debate, as he has just tried to do.

Senator Flynn: I was referring to facts. You raised the question of skill, so explain that.

Senator Austin: I am puzzled to know how he has decided that there are Canadians with no aptitude for taking responsibility for their lives and their actions.

Senator Flynn: There is certainly no doubt about Canadians being able to take responsibility for their lives, but you raised the question of skill.

Senator Austin: Yes, and that is a matter for those who volunteer to participate to decide. Not everybody plays tennis, unfortunately.

Senator Flynn: No, but everybody will try to play this game.

Senator Austin: Those who think they have a particular skill will try to play this game. Are you going to tell them that they do not have that special skill?

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have a supplementary question for the minister. This morning on Canada AM the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport appeared. He said that this was a good product that the government wanted to present to the Canadian people, but was reluctant to give any details. Could Senator Austin provide us with those details?

Senator Austin: I will be in a big hurry to give you the details just as soon as my colleague who is responsible for the matter announces them.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I have a supplementary question. Does the minister think that Commissioner Kuhn would accept a proposal that the sports pool be operated by the CDIC, which comes under the tutelage of Senator Austin, because, if he did, no one would have to worry about profits.

Senator Austin: If that has your endorsement, I will be pleased to pass it on to him.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

SALE OF SHARES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, last year the minister responsible for the Canada Development Corporation announced that the government would dispose of its CDC shares before the end of 1983. I now understand that the situation has been reversed. I have been told that the government is not going to sell those CDC shares. Would the minister give us some background on that? Does the minister expect to sell those shares in the future, has the policy been reversed, or is this due to a marketplace condition? What information can he give us on that particular situation?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, when I appeared before the Finance Committee of the House of Commons on the Canadair item in March, I advised them that the situation with respect to the possibility of a sale by the government of its shares, or any part of them, in Canada Development Corporation had changed somewhat. The board of directors of Canada Development Corporation feel that the market environment, including, of course, the losses which that company has been suffering, do not currently provide a commercial opportunity for a sale, and such sale would not be in the interests of Canada Development Corporation. We have separately come to the same conclusion for commercial reasons only and, therefore, I advised the committee in the other place, and I am happy to confirm it here, that we will not be actively endeavouring to find a purchaser for those shares. Should the circumstances relating to the financial situation of Canada Development Corporation and the markets generally improve, then, of course, that conclusion could change. If there were a buyer hitherto unknown who should appear, then that might change our position. I had left the expectation, as a result of my discussions with Anthony Hampson, the President of Canada Development Corporation in May of 1982 that the shares were in the market and that we expected to have commercial discussions about sales. As that has changed, I did not want to leave the previous impression outstanding, and Mr. Hampson was in agreement with the statement I made.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. I gather that the change in direction is dictated by the market rather than by policy. The fundamental decision still remains that if the market changes then the government will divest itself of some of the shares.

Senator Austin: That understanding is correct.

Senator Doody: Then, may I ask the minister if there is a minimum share value that the CDC or the government feels must be reached before the government will begin selling its shares?

As a further supplementary, one of the major reasons, I suspect, for the depressed condition now, relative to several years ago, of the CDC shares is the indebtedness of the company. Some of its purchases have not been that spectacular, for instance, that of Savin Corporation. Has government decided to try to relieve CDC of some of its indebtedness, as it has with Canadair? Will it be setting up an old CDC and a new one and let the taxpayers look after the old garbage while we plunge ahead into new and unknown areas, or are we going to try to suffer this one out and let CDC carry its own load?

Senator Austin: On the first part of your question, we have not received from CDIC specific advice with respect to a minimum or maximum price. We have asked them for sound commercial advice but, and as we currently do not have a buyer, the question is quite hypothetical. Of course, we would want to market our shares at a favourable time, and this is not the time, so we cannot predict in advance what a good market price would be without knowing what the condition of the market is into which we might be willing to sell shares. As the market stands now, we are not willing to sell shares, nor does CDC want us to sell them.

On the second part of your question, I want it to be very clear that I regret as much as, and, because I put a lot of time and energy into it, probably more than anyone else that Canadair took the losses that it has taken. Since the time of my responsibility for Canadair—the beginning of December or late November 1982—I believe my statements have been full and complete with respect to what took place. I have provided data unlike that provided on any other crown corporation.

However, the losses were taken and, as I have said before, there is no use crying over spilled milk. The question is: How do we protect the technology; the jobs in the Montreal community; and the many dozens of corporations and the hundreds of individuals who are part of the multiplier support for Canadair?

I believe that, in establishing the new Canadair vehicle, we have been able to create a balance sheet for Canadair that will protect those jobs, protect that technology and begin to earn something on the investment although we will never recover, as I have said, the amount of $1.350 billion that has been lost.

In order to sell aircraft the balance sheet has to be clean. Our buyers have given us a very clear signal that they like the aircraft and that they think the technology is superb, but they do not want to deal with a bankrupt company. They want to deal with a company that will stay in business, be able to service the aircraft and be able to maintain a good secondary market for that aircraft, which cannot be done by a company that does not have financial viability.

Honourable senators, Canada Development Corporation is an excellent corporation which, like many others in Canada, has had an adverse financial experience. I truly hope and believe that it is weathering that experience.

There is no desire on the part of its directors to make any further equity investment in that company, and no desire on my part to make any further equity investment in that company; nor do I believe it is necessary for the federal government to do so in order to support it, under the circumstances of CDC, as I understand them. I think it is a free-standing company which is improving as the weeks go by.

I want to remind this chamber, as I have often said, that Canada Development Corporation is a company in the private sector, that the holding of the government is in the nature of a portfolio holding, and that in no way do we involve ourselves in its management or in its day-to-day business.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Senator Austin should come to the Senate more often.

Senator Austin: If the honourable senator asks more questions, I will be here.

Senator Doody: As a further supplementary, I would point out that Senator Austin and I have had a fundamental disagreement for some time in this regard because taxpayers' money is involved. I really do not feel the government can divorce itself from the responsibility for the direction of that corporation or, at least, an accounting for it.

Senator Austin: That is not the official position of Senator Doody's party.

Senator Doody: The position is that Parliament is responsible for taxpayers' money. Taxpayers' money is in that corporation, and the minister is responsible to Parliament and the people; that is the fundamental position. What rules are made after that are secondary to the fundamental responsibility of the ministry to Parliament.

I take note of what the minister said about the transferring of the debt to the new company. I can only comment on that to the extent that many hundreds of companies that went bankrupt in Canada over the past few years would have been delighted to have a godfather upstairs to whom they could have transferred their debt while they carried on with their new business endeavours. Canadair was fortunate to have the minister and his associates available to initiate that transfer.

I have one last question regarding CDC and that is: Is there still a stipulation that Canadian control will be maintained in CDC in the event of a share sale or transfer? There have been purchases outside of Canada, and I wonder how firm the commitment is to Canadian control of this particular corporation.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, with respect to the first part of the question, I know that Senator Doody's view is longstanding, and it is that when we have a portfolio position in a Canadian private-sector company we should, nonetheless, play the role that would be played by a shareholder in the private sector, and that we should intervene as a private-sector shareholder. That has not been my view. In the circumstances, I believe we should keep our distance unless there is a specific reason for not doing so.

Senator Doody's position has never had the support of his party or his leader, and that, of course, is persuasive. If it were otherwise, with respect to the CDC, I would be most interested to hear it.

Hon. Lowell Murray: But you have not stayed at arm's length.

Senator Austin: I have now forgotten the second part of your question.

Senator Doody: Canadian content, a secondary issue.

Senator Austin: Oh, yes, thank you. The bill that has now had first reading in the other place, Bill C-25, provides that the CDC will be established as a Canadian business corporation and will no longer be continued as a statutory corporation. It will be for the shareholders of the CDC to decide whether they want to continue, by by-law, a restriction on Canadian ownership.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Who is going to vote the government's shares?

SPORTS POOL

STATEMENT BY SENATOR PERRAULT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I should like to make a short personal statement. Recently, in a Canadian publication, an article suggested that I could be in conflict of interest because I am the honorary chairman of the Vancouver Canadians baseball team in Vancouver. I have been in active support of bringing major league baseball to the west coast. I want to assure my colleagues that I am not in conflict of interest in that regard.

This matter has been fully discussed with the Privy Council Office. I do have a passionate belief that we should, if possible, extend major league baseball to Canada's third largest city, the city of Vancouver, and that we should bring this new industry to western Canada. It is worth $85 million a year in new economic activity.

I want to assure honourable senators that when I was Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport, I was never entrusted with the responsibility for the sports pool.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He was a good minister.

Senator Perrault: That responsibility was assigned only after I had left my portfolio—indeed, it was assigned to my successor, despite my suggestions over many months to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister that he should clarify the situation rapidly and assign that responsibility. He refused to do so during the time I was minister. For that reason, I was not in a position to negotiate with the provinces. I was not in a position to try to engage in constructive initiatives to make sure that the sports pool would be launched under auspicious circumstances.

Together with honourable senators, I regret the fact that so much controversy has swirled around the launching of what should be an acceptable device by which to raise money for such good causes as medical research, the Calgary Winter Olympics, and sports development in this country. I regret that there has been this controversy.

As far as major league baseball is concerned, it was suggested to me by the commissioner of baseball that I should attend the meetings that were held this week in New York, but I declined to do so in the knowledge that there would be two ministers attending those talks, and I have a great deal of confidence in at least one of them.

Senator Asselin: We know you were not invited.

Senator Perrault: Of course, the person in whom I have complete confidence is our colleague in the Senate.

I have been somewhat critical of the present Minister of Sport for the following reason: in his initial statement, he said that Mr. Kuhn, his commissioner of baseball, was attempting to interfere in the internal affairs of Canada. Let us examine that statement. Mr. Kuhn is commissioner of baseball. One of his prime responsibilities is to maintain the integrity of the game. Senator Austin has very accurately given some of the historical background. In 1919, the Chicago "Black Sox" scandal led to the establishment of the office of the commissioner. Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis was installed in that office to protect the integrity of baseball.

Honourable senators, we have chosen to be a part of North American baseball. We have chosen to abide by the rules of major league baseball in this North America of ours, and that means that the Toronto Blue Jays and the Montreal Expos come under the jurisdiction of the commissioner of baseball, just as Vancouver would, should we be successful in our pursuit of a franchise. Therefore, it was not interference, it was a re-statement by Mr. Kuhn of baseball's traditional opposition to gaming, lotteries or any element of gambling with respect to major league baseball teams. Even at this late date I hope that some satisfactory accommodation can be achieved in order that baseball's traditional concerns can be met, just as I hope that the problems of the provinces can be resolved.

Senator Austin said that there would not be any decision on baseball until 1985. I have certain other information on that point. At recent baseball meetings there were at least indications that a basic decision to expand could be taken at the all-star game in San Francisco this summer. Additionally, two of the owners have told me that two franchises may be brought into one of the leagues by next winter, and that Vancouver is one of the top three candidates. That is a matter of record.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You will not get the Expos.

Senator Perrault: I sincerely hope that the difficulties that are being experienced during the "teething stage" of the sports pool can be overcome. There is no doubt that pool proceeds are needed and that the money will go toward good purposes. If called upon to advise and to help, I promise to do anything I can to assist in the process of achieving a better climate.

Senator Asselin: Hear, hear. They need you.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I wish to place on record that when I spoke to Commissioner Kuhn yesterday, he said that no decision would be taken in 1984, and that it would be early in 1985 before the requisite information that the owners required would be placed before them. Senator Perrault may have other information, and, from the point of view of a franchise in Vancouver, I hope he is right because the sooner the better.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION FUND

PAYMENTS TO PRODUCERS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PRICES BY CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senator, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board concerning the Western Grain Stabilization Program. I understand that the funds amount to approximately $900 million, which the farmers have contributed toward that program.

In view of the negotiations that have taken place, I would ask the minister whether there is any possibility of any of the money being released at this time, without any profit to the government or affecting the fund's budget in any way?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, if money is to be released to farmers from the Western Grain Stabilization Fund in this calendar year, it would require an amending bill to be placed before Parliament and passed. It is certainly correct that there is well over $900 million in the fund, and the fund continues to grow. There has not been a payout for four years, and farmers' costs continue to escalate.

The reason a payout has not been made is that those who introduced the initial legislation, and put the fund together, did not take into account the severe economic inflation or the large grain exports that have taken place. As a result, there was a larger flow of money into the fund and increased costs arising from inflation.

It is estimated that if amendments are provided to establish a price factor—not merely volume of sales times the price, but a price factor itself—and if the period for which contributions are made should be changed from the calendar year to the crop year, then those two steps would enable a payment to be made this year.

For the information of honourable senators, there was a thorough discussion of this question before the Agriculture Committee of the other place. I considered it to be a good meeting. A motion was introduced by Doug Neil, the Conservative member for Moose Jaw, asking, in parliamentary terms, that consideration be given to certain amendments that would result in a payout, and the motion was passed unanimously.

I believe that all honourable senators will understand that to get legislation passed during this session will require an all-party agreement. I am hopeful I can introduce a bill that can be tabled in Parliament to provide for important and necessary changes to what is a very good act, and that with the co-operation of all three parties the bill will become law and farmers will be able to obtain from the fund the money I believe they are fully justified in asking for.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I am grateful to the minister for informing us that a bill will be introduced which will allow funds to be released to western farmers. Has a rate been established for the initial payment on grain? If so, how much and how soon?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I believe I omitted to answer part of the honourable senator's question concerning the Western Grain Stabilization Fund, namely, whether it would involve any cost to the government. The answer is that the program is set up on the basis of the federal government's paying a contribution of 2 per cent of certain gross receipts, and farmers paying a contribution of 4 per cent of the same gross receipts. If a bill is introduced in Parliament—and I hope it will be—it can be said at that time that, based on the analysis, the program will remain actuarially sound and therefore it will not be a call on the treasury as such. The fund has been built up. It exists. In my judgment, it is excessively large, and I believe that action should be taken to make a payment at this time and to change the terms on which payments are made in future.

With regard to initial prices and their establishment, the season is now upon us when it is the practice for the minister responsible to announce the initial prices for various grains for this year. I hope to make that announcement in due course, well before seeding. Recommendations I have received from departmental officials and the Canadian Wheat Board indicate that the world outlook with regard to competition, to size of stocks, and to price prospects is such that initial prices should be lowered by a substantial amount.

The theory behind the initial prices within the present marketing system is that they are established for the beginning of the crop year at a level that, it is projected, reflects the likely market, and as a percentage of the likely market price that will not call on the treasury for a payment. There is always a certain risk, and the advantages of such a system is that when initial prices are established, the nation's treasury stands behind those initial prices. We had an example last year when there was a deficit in the barley pool of $5.5 million and there was criticism of the Wheat Board's system costing the treasury any money, even what I consider to be the rather modest sum of $5.5 million. So the idea is to set it at a level that is not likely to cost the treasury money. In the past, during my term as minister responsible for the Wheat Board, if between the time of the announcement and the coming into effect of the initial prices, namely, August 1, it was felt that market conditions had changed so that there could, in fact, be an increase in those prices, the projected prices were actually increased before they came into effect.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): And never reduced.

Senator Argue: That's right. When we get into the crop year, if it becomes apparent that world prices are higher than had been anticipated some months before, an interim or additional payment can be made during the crop year. So long as I continue to exercise my present responsibilities, I will certainly give an undertaking that if those conditions change, then I am prepared to recommend a change to my colleagues.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is what I call a comprehensive statement.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (GERALD HARVEY FUDGE AND AUDREY MARIE SAUNDERS; LOUIS PHILIPPE NADEAU AND MARIE THÉRÈSE RITA BRULÉ; ERNEST HODEL AND NORMA DORA LAURIE; BENJAMIN JOSSEPH ANDRADE AND HEATHER WINNIFRED ANDRADE; JUAN ANDRADE AND EMILIA RODRIGUEZ; HENRI PATRY AND ALDÉA BÉA PITT; JOSEPH ROLAND RÉJEAN DAOUST AND MARIE LISE SYLVIE GIRARD; AND PEARL KIM LEE AND THOMAS SIEGFRIED WIELAND)—

THIRD READING

● (1450)

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved for third reading of Bills S-2 to S-9, inclusive, to provide an exemption from the public general law relating to marriage.

He said: Honourable senators, at yesterday's sitting, it was agreed to have Bills S-2 to S-9, inclusive, dealt with en bloc. Perhaps the eight bills could be called now, and I will then move for third reading.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, before proceeding with third reading, I would like to say a few words about the private bills before the Senate today.

We took some time to study them because the Opposition had every reason to want to find out the Government's position on these private bills, a whole series of which have been tabled in the Senate since 1975-78. In 1978 Senator Perrault, who was Leader of the Government at the time, promised us that the Minister of Justice, who was Otto Lang, I believe, was seriously considering the possibility of amending the general law to include these exemption cases. Since we have never received an affirmative reply from the Minister of Justice, we had to start all over again this year and urge the present Minister of Justice to take action so that the Senate would not be flooded with a series of private bills of this kind, as had been the case for far too long with divorce bills.

Honourable senators will recall that when divorce was not allowed in Quebec, these cases were examined in the Senate by a special committee. The Divorce Committee's sittings were endless, and the Senate had acquired a reputation for having more power than the Pope to "unmarry" people who were already married.

I remember that when I was a young lawyer, a gentleman came to see me to have his marriage annulled by the Church, but I was not successful. He went to see another lawyer and came before the Senate. A few months later, he got his divorce. Later he came to see me at my office and said: "Mr. Asselin, now I know that the Senate is more powerful than the Pope, because the Pope refused to annul my marriage, but the Senate unmarried me."

This is not to say that the cases before the Senate today are similar to divorce cases, but we on this side of the House do not want this annual stream of requests for marriage law exemptions to continue. We feel that when the general laws of this country are no longer observed by the vast majority of the population, it is up to Parliament to amend and change the law. That is why we may have been a little too emphatic in committee and perhaps hurt the feelings of some of the petitioners and their attorney, with our long discussions. However, we wanted to be sure that the Minister of Justice would appear before the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and be given a chance to reiterate the promise made by his predecessor to change the general law.

The Minister appeared before the committee. Of course, it was a difficult time for him because he had just announced he would be a candidate for the leadership of the Liberal Party. Although we have been good friends since 1950, I did not want to be too congratulatory, I wanted to tell him that I could not vote for him since, obviously, I would not be invited to the Liberal Convention.

In any event, that was the kind of atmosphere there was when the Minister appeared before the committee. After lengthy discussions and exchanges of views, the Minister inferred that he would not be unfavourably disposed towards a bill that would incorporate the exemptions being sought in the private bills before the Senate today. However, the minister made a vague promise as to whether it would be done in a month or in a year because, as he put it, the matter must be submitted to the senior officers of the Department of Justice, it has to be considered and reconsidered, and a new bill will have to be drafted. One should not hold one's breath when dealing with bureaucrats—federal and provincial alike.

We did not really expect that the general legislation might come up for amendment in the foreseeable future. That is when the members of the committee suggested that perhaps a private or semiprivate bill—

[Senator Asselin.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): A private public bill.

Senator Asselin: Right, a private public bill.

Our Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel has distributed a bill which will be introduced by our colleague Senator Stanbury and which we may have an opportunity to debate later on.

Since that bill would be introduced in the Senate, we then agreed to examine the private bills of exemption sponsored by Senator Leblanc on behalf of the petitioners. That did give us an opportunity to delve somewhat deeper into the subject matter of the private bills before us.

I was not unduly concerned over the fact that there was affinity between couples who wanted to marry; that did not worry me, but the issue of consanguinity did arise in some cases and many of the private bills we have now involve direct relationships through consanguinity. Some experts came to enlighten us on those cases of consanguinity—especially a Montreal physician whose name I forget—and they said that in-depth studies of those cases revealed that the consequences might not be as disastrous as some people used to think. We felt reassured and so we agreed to re-introduce private bills of exemption in the Senate.

We do hope that the bill introduced for first reading by Senator Stanbury will be well received and passed quickly. We hope as well—and I will make that request to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate—that the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Mr. MacGuigan, will agree to sponsor that private bill as a government bill. He can do that, otherwise a private bill can be sent to the other place and remain on the order paper for weeks and months without coming up for debate. However, if the minister wants to introduce it as a government bill, it would be considered as such and might be adopted more rapidly.

On those conditions, honourable senators, we accept to adopt those bills on third reading.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to make my position clear. I intend to vote against this Bill because I believe that such problems should be solved by the general law. I would like to point out that, if the Senate passes these Bills at the third reading stage, it will be in a totally illogical position if it then decides to reject the Bill introduced by Senator Stanbury. If we vote against these Bills, we would have the option of amending the general law; that would be possible. However, I believe that it is illogical for the Senate to pass this private Bill before considering the Bill introduced by Senator Stanbury. This is why I shall let this Bill pass on division, unless other senators request a vote.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I find the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition perfectly logical. It is true that the Bill which Senator Stanbury will introduce would seem to settle all the cases which cause me some concern.

At the Committee meeting yesterday, I was concerned with this issue since the purpose of so many private bills will probably be served by Senator Stanbury's Bill.

However, I cannot agree with the Leader of the Opposition since I must vote in support of these Bills. On the other hand, I believe that there is some weakness, and on this point, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition.

Motion agreed to and Bills read third time and passed on division.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Tunisia, Canada and the People's Republic of Bangladesh, Canada and the United Republic of Cameroon and Canada and the Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka, an agreement between Canada and Kenya and conventions between Canada and the Arab Republic of Egypt, Canada and the Republic of the Ivory Coast and Canada and Sweden for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.— (Honourable Senator Flynn P.C.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before Senator Flynn commences his remarks, I would remind you that yesterday I said I would look into the question of the constitutionality of this type of legislation.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I did it myself.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn says he did it himself; he may have come to the same conclusion I did. I found that this issue was raised with respect to Bill S-24 which, in effect, is exactly the same as the one before us. The only difference is the method of approving or disapproving of the orders in council which, in my view, changes the bill, but not on this point. I agree that we must look at the new form, but I did not think that new form of negative-positive resolution, et cetera, has anything to do with the issue of constitutionality. We did go into that issue quite thoroughly with respect to Bill S-24. That bill was studied by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee and was passed by the Senate and the House of Commons. Thus, for me, the question of constitutionality has been satisfactorily answered.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that the bill before us will be sent to committee in any event.

Senator Frith: Yes, that is right.

Senator Thériault: I am not an expert, nor am I a lawyer; however, I have seen a great deal of legislation in my lifetime. I am not convinced by the statement of the Deputy Leader of the Government that the order in council does not vary the bill as compared to bill S-24.

Senator Frith: The committee can take a look at that aspect. However, it is my opinion at first blush that it does not change it. That, of course, does not prevent the committee from looking at it in order to ensure that it does not change the principle established in Bill S-24, namely, that such bills are not money bills in the constitutional sense.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, regarding the question whether this is a money bill, I certainly agree with the conclusions of Senator Frith's research. I checked myself: for ten years or so, we have passed a large number of bills initiated and approved in the Senate before being sent to the other place, and there were never any objections. Of course, this does not mean the point should not be raised in committee.

As for the question about the point raised by Senator Tremblay, which was to what extent these conventions affect taxes levied by the provinces, this point has been raised previously, and undoubtedly there are consequences in some cases. However, a committee would have to check to what extent.

Regarding clauses 28 and 29, which we considered yesterday, there is no doubt that with the new formula, Parliament no longer has the option of saying no to substantial changes. I feel that Senator Thériault's objections should be formulated in committee. Personally, I shall certainly object to this new formula. I believe we should go back to the old formula, since, as Senator Godfrey mentioned yesterday, Parliament should have a chance to say no.

However, subject to these reservations, I think the bill can be adopted on second reading and referred to committee.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Buckwold, I move that this bill be referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for study and report.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government. Why is the bill being referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee as opposed to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is a good point. Bill S-24 was referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee on the last occasion because of this question of constitutionality. Senator Godfrey is quite right; the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee can study this bill. In fact, such bills normally go to that committee.

Honourable senators, with leave, I will change my motion to provide that this bill be referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee subject, of course, to the understanding that the same questions can be raised there.

Motion agreed to.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1984-85

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-21, intituled: "An Act to provide borrowing authority".—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I hardly know how to approach the subject—it is so well worn in this chamber—of the deficit, the national debt and the means by which these problems are accommodated in Canadian fiscal policy.

If one looks at the bill, one sees that it is a rather poor thing. It has three clauses, 34 lines and about 250 words. In fact, one could almost get everything on one page, but it certainly packs quite a wallop because it authorizes the raising of $24.50 billion. We have been told, and I think it is true, that the whole of that amount will be used up by the time the next fiscal year rolls around and that the government will be going to the Canadian market for approximately $2 billion a month of new money, to say nothing of what they must do to roll over maturing portions of the present national debt of $140 billion.

I have to admit that the present Parliament, including this chamber, is pretty case-hardened when it comes to any review or discussion of the deficit, the national debt and the interest charges that belong to it, and although I expressed my view that the trends in our fiscal policy have catastrophic implications, not only for the present time but for the future, I have to admit that, as far as our debates in this house are concerned, the question of public finance is barely acknowledged as a serious problem.

That attitude is in curious contrast to that which prevails in the United States of America, for example. In that country, they have a deficit this year that will run somewhere between $150 billion to $200 billion—probably closer to the latter amount. However, in that country the national debt and the deficit are real issues. They are not only issues in the legislature; they are issues in the street. If you walk down the street of any town in that great republic and talk about the deficit on the federal account, you can stimulate a vigorous debate. You can also stimulate the expression of almost universal opinion that the deficit is too high and that something should be done about it. From the man in the street to Mr. Paul A. Volcker at the monetary control office, the question of the deficit in the United States is one that brings real anxiety. We see it overhanging the market, and we see it overhanging main street in every town in that great country.

Here, in a land where our debt, proportionately speaking, is at least 50 per cent higher than that in the United States; in this country which has a reputation for prudence and sometimes even parsimony, when I reflect upon our French-speaking and Scottish ancestry and when I reflect upon the development of the Canadian banking system; in this country of prudent economic managers, we find few people, certainly few on the cabinet benches, who are worried about this particular question.

The Minister of Finance has said that he is not afraid of the deficit that we have in this country today. It puzzles me as to how to demonstrate to my colleagues in this house that the Minister of Finance should think again. Quite obviously, he does command in the legislature of Canada, both the Senate and the House of Commons, wide support for the thought that this deficit is really not something that we should become as concerned about as I, for one, would like us to be.

How do we illustrate, in terms that ordinary people can understand, what a fiscal policy of this sort means? How do we illustrate what these years of deficit financing, and these last 16 years of accumulating burden in respect of the debt structure of this country, mean to us? There are a number of ways of looking at it. The International Monetary Fund took a look at it and came to the conclusion that, with respect to interest, the Canadian debt servicing burden was the biggest in the industrial world. Our employment situation is pretty bad, too, but this certainly adds to the mix when we find out what the burden of servicing this debt is on the public finances and, therefore, on the taxpayers of this country.

I have said it to the house before, and I repeat it because it is an illustrative figure, that out of every $3 that we actually collect in tax money from the taxpayers of this country, $1 is dedicated to do nothing but pay the interest on the national debt. It is easy to say, but think about the implications of that state of affairs. There are, in this country today, some ten million taxpayers who pay personal federal income tax. In 1983, the average amount of money each of those ten million taxpayers paid to the tax collector was $2,800. However, the debt charges per taxpayer in this country are $1,700, so more than half of the money paid by each taxpayer of Canada in personal income tax to the federal government did nothing more than pay the interest on the national debt. It seems to me that this situation is one which raises the question, in biblical terms: How long, O Lord, how long? Although I would not use that expression, I just say that there does not appear to be any relief on the horizon.

The government, however, has not been idle in connection with this matter. New taxes are being levied. By the thoughtful provision of the budget of April 1983, we are now entering into a phase where new taxes are being collected by our federal administration. Let me tell you what they amount to. In 1984, this year, the new tax will provide an additional $2.140 billion. For 1985, it is much higher—$4.340 billion. In 1986, it will be $5.654 billion, so there is new money coming into the treasury on account of these extra taxes that are being levied in this year for the first time.

However, in spite of the new taxes and the government's fiscal plan, if it deserves that title and if it is to be believed, in spite of these very large increases in taxation, the deficit will not come down very much. It will not be decreased either through the application of the new revenues or because of the fact that prosperity, good times or whatever the Minister of Finance wishes to call them, will provide more money for the public treasury. In spite of those two factors which ought to increase the flow of cash into the government treasury, the decrease in the deficit, as estimated in the fiscal plan over the next few years, is derisory. In 1983-84, the deficit will be down $1.85 billion over the previous year while the new taxes alone will raise $2.140 billion. In the next fiscal year, the deficit will come down another $1.68 billion, while at the same time the new money coming in from taxes increases by $4.360 billion. In the following year, the debt burden will go down by less than $1 billion, to wit, $850 million, while the new taxes being levied will amount to $5.654 billion. Those figures from the government's fiscal plan make it perfectly clear that, in spite of the fact that we will be imposing new and very substantial, higher taxes on the public, and in spite of the fact that these figures include an estimate for the progress of the economy that is not generally shared by many people who look at it—in spite of those things, when it comes to reducing the national debt in the country, and when it comes to reducing the deficit in the federal budget plan, we find that we barely scratch the surface.

What will happen if we do not have these good times that the Minister of Finance is prophesying; what happens if they do not materialize? It is quite obvious what is going to happen—the deficit will be a lot larger. I certainly hope that the Minister of Finance is right, because nobody in his right mind, for any reason whatsoever, would want the deficits to climb any higher.

However, we have to face the fact that, depending on the good times as forecast by the minister, there is a possibility—and I put it no higher than that—that he will not realize his goals and that the deficits, instead of improving, even if ever so slightly, will become worse.

Hon. Peter Bosa: How do they compare with the gross national product?

Senator Roblin: How do they compare with the gross national product? My honourable friend can find the answer to that in the fiscal records, if he wants. I do not see the relevance of that question in respect to my argument, because a billion is a billion is a billion, no matter how it compares to the gross national product. However, since my honourable friend is asking about the gross national product, let us look at some of these figures.

● (1520)

Mr. Lalonde said in his budget of February last that for 1984 the gross national product, or what I call the real economic growth, will rise by 4.9 per cent. Well, maybe so. The Conference Board of Canada the other day said that they did not believe that; they said it would rise by 3.5 per cent, which is 50 per cent less than what the Minister of Finance is anticipating. I do not say that the Conference Board of Canada has any magic number, that they know what is right, but that is one indication of what substantial people think, and if you want to pile up the evidence by investigating the forecasts of all economists, I think you will find that there is considerable evidence to make one believe that some of them think that Mr. Lalonde may be overestimating what may happen.

For 1985 Mr. Lalonde has estimated that the gross national product will rise by 3.5 per cent; the Conference Board of Canada says that it will rise by less than one half of one per cent, which is practically nothing. So, if you want to compare the debt with the gross national product, or the real value of the economy, there is those sets of figures to look at. However you interpret those figures, they establish the point, I think, that unless we are fortunate, unless we do have that increase in the gross national product that Mr. Lalonde is forecasting, the odds are that we will wind up worse—in fact a good deal worse—than what he shows for the years down the road.

So, there is a substantial risk—and I put it no higher than that and I hope that it never materializes—that the future projections made by the government in its fiscal plan will turn out to be too optimistic. We know that inflation is not entirely subdued; we know that unemployment here is not better, it is worse, and that in the United States it has fallen drastically to 7 or 8 per cent; and we know that interest rates in Canada are up. There are plenty of cautionary signs to indicate there is absolutely no leeway in this business of the public deficit.

There is another way to look at the problem we are facing. If we analyse the fiscal plan the government has given us for the next five years, we find that according to that plan the government will borrow the sum of $91.2 billion. That is the sum they expect to borrow over the next five years. An interesting comparison is to see what the government expects to pay in interest over the next five years. The interest on the public debt according to the fiscal plan is nearly $91 billion. The government is going to borrow $91.2 billion and will use almost all of it—$91 billion—for what? To pay the interest on the public debt. To invest in something productive; to free up the capital of the country; to stimulate the enterprise system and to provide more jobs; for constructive uses of which we might be able to approve? Unfortunately not. All that that sum of $91.2 billion is going to do is pay the operating expenses; all that will do is pay the interest on the national debt for the next five years. Think about that—$91 billion to be borrowed over five years in order to pay the interest on the national debt. It does not retire a nickel, it just pays the interest, and that is the pressure of compound interest rates. Look at the deficit of our country and look at the impact of this borrowing bill from that point of view if you want to gain some appreciation of what it might mean to the country.

If one takes the whole of the budget today, 25 per cent is dedicated to paying interest on the national debt, but by 1987, if current trends continue, 40 per cent of the budget—not the cash inlay, but the cash plus what is borrowed—will be required to pay the interest on the national debt. Imagine the situation we will be in if this comes to pass. If you look at the fiscal plan the government has presented to us for this five-year period, there is every reason to think it will come to pass. Of the budget of the country, 40 per cent will be dedicated to paying the interest on the national debt, yet we are told that we need not be afraid of the deficit of over $20 billion we have in our financial accounts today.

There is another way of looking at this. From 1961 to 1983 the CPI rose by 270 per cent. During the same period of time, total Canadian incomes rose by 524 per cent. That is a figure Senator Bosa will be interested in—the total income of the country. But the debt-servicing costs went up by 1102 per cent. The fastest-rising item of the expenditure of the Government of Canada is interest to pay the national debt.

I can give you more figures, but perhaps they are hard to digest if one is just listening to them. Perhaps they are not very stimulating, but if one reflects upon them in private, they may be more meaningful.

In 1984 the Canadian deficit is equal to 91 per cent of the personal savings of the people of Canada; 91 per cent of the personal savings of the people of Canada is required to finance the debt that is covered by the bill that is before us, and not only that, many borrowers in Canada have been forced abroad.

I see from this statement the Bank of Canada issued yesterday, and which my colleague referred to, mentions that we had a flexible position in terms of raising money within the country; that it really did not put any pressure on interest rates and we need not be concerned about that. Well, maybe so, but one fact we all know is that it is not only within Canada that people are doing their borrowing. The provincial governments in particular, the provincial utilities in particular, and a good many corporations in the private sector, are not borrowing all their money in the Canadian market; they are borrowing it in foreign markets. The result is that the Canadian foreign debt today is $76 billion. It is no real source of pride to say so, but that puts us in the same league as Brazil and Mexico in terms of volume, although I hasten to add we are not in the same league with Brazil and Mexico with respect to our general fiscal policy, and thank God for that.

The interest on the money we borrowed abroad comes to $10 billion a year, and it takes all the wheat that my friends in western Canada sell and all the natural gas we export to pay the interest on the national debt that has been placed abroad and not placed in Canada. So we have this dead-weight government debt not in wealth-producing items but just to pay operating costs. That is the record.

I must admit that this is not the first time I have raised this matter in the chamber. I must admit that I have not been very successful in attracting support for the proposition that we should express our concern about this state of affairs. I must admit that most honourable senators agree with the Minister of Finance that we do not need to be afraid of the deficit, and I presume it follows from that that we do not need to worry about the fiscal plan either that he has projected for the next five years and which we have before us, but I will be the first to admit that, even if my position were adopted entirely, there is no quick fix. That is the problem we have to recognize. We have to recognize that 16 years of folly will not be cured overnight; we have to admit that this is like the giant leviathan on the sea—you cannot turn it around in a second; it will take a great deal of time. We have to admit that good times are not going to bail us out; that too much of our debt is structural and not related to the economy as it moves up and down, but there are some things that we can do and some things that this house ought to express its opinion upon.

If we want to do something about the future, the first thing we should do is plan to live within our budget. For the past 15 years no government—well, I will exclude the Clark Government because it did not get a chance to find out, but during the last 15 years of the regime of the current Prime Minister, I do not believe there was one year in which we lived within the original budget estimates placed before the House of Commons. We have to learn to live within our budgets.

The second thing that I think this house ought to do is tell the government that when raising new taxes those funds should be dedicated to reducing the national debt and not dissipated, no matter in what desirable way, in order to spread the money among the people of the country. I think that our long-term interests would be better served if we were to insist on new tax dollars being dedicated to reducing the national debt.

The third thing we should suggest is that we recognize priorities. We cannot do everything. We should try to make up our minds on those things we can do without. I suggest that we start on this business of priorities by dealing with the Liberal slush funds that we have heard so much about recently. If these electioneering expenditures were eliminated from the budget, we would be half a billion dollars ahead in our plan to make the country a little more fiscally responsible than it is at the present time.

Senator Bosa: What about job creation programs?

Senator Roblin: They want to create jobs by returning Liberal members of Parliament. That is what the job creation programs are all about. A lot of that job creation business is the most dead-end proposition one ever saw, to suck people into these—well, I believe the expression is “leaf-raking jobs”, but they are not as bad as that.

● (1530)

An Hon. Senator: What about the advertising agencies?

Senator Roblin: They have a bonanza. They know when they are well off. If this money were being spent on permanent jobs that really did something to reinforce the economic structure of the country, I might have to change my tune, but I do not believe that is the case. It seems to me that it is a slush fund. It is being used for temporary purposes. It is not going to do anybody much good in the long run except put a little spending money in their pockets on election day so that they know what to do when they get to the ballot box. But let me leave that aside; I did not intend to be provoked into a political discussion.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You can blame Senator Bosa.

Senator Roblin: I know that Senator Bosa likes to exchange views with me and, of course, I would not dream of talking politics to the Senate. That is something that we do not approve of entirely.

I just want to make a very simple statement. The deficits do matter, despite what anyone says. They are not an abstract problem. They deal with the lives, the livelihood and the welfare of men and women in our country. If they are not managed in a sensible way, the money that the deficits raise to spend for whatever purposes in the long run turns into a boomerang to impede the development of our economy. The federal government—if my mandate extended further I would refer to other governments, but it does not—must learn to live within their means, and they must offer reasonable assurances that they can find a way to do just that and to deal with the deficit in an effective manner in the foreseeable future. There is nothing in this bill that makes me confident that any of those things are being considered by those in authority. There is nothing in this fiscal plan, which I have looked into in some detail, that leads me to think that they are really attacking the problem that I am concerned about in a timely and effective way.

For those reasons, I have to say that I have no confidence in the fiscal policy of the present administration. I agree it is not the function of the Senate to refuse finance bills because that is a confidence matter and not our responsibility, but I have to express my concern about the state the nation is in. I have to express my concern that once again we are being confronted with these monumental requests for more new money, most of which is simply going to pay the housekeeping bills and very little, if any, to promote the development of our economy and the welfare of our people. I am sure this bill will pass this house, but I regret that I cannot give it my approbation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Roblin that this bill packs a lot of punch for the number of words. It reminds me of what Senator Buckwold said last evening about the number of words in the Lord's Prayer. I will not carry that metaphor any further.

I also agree with Senator Roblin that deficits are not an abstract question. They affect the lives of all Canadians. The borrowing authority bill which is being presented here, linked as it is to the deficit, is not being presented with the idea that it is an artificial or abstract question. The bill is tightly linked to the budget and, therefore, the discussions on the deficit are quite relevant. Senator Roblin and other honourable senators understand that the government is concerned about the deficit, and will continue to be concerned. However, let it be clear that this deficit is a part of the budget plan, the fiscal plan, for an investment-led recovery and an expansion of the economy. It is deliberately accepted as a higher deficit than would otherwise be desirable for exactly that purpose, with the intention and understanding that the expansion will have the result of reducing the deficit. That is the risk, and there is always a risk in this sort of planning. As Senator Roblin said: What if it doesn't work?

Senator Roblin: Even if it does work, it is no good.

Senator Frith: Governments have to make decisions as to how to plan these things and what risks to take. It is clear that that plan is not supported by Senator Roblin, but it is not a mysterious plan.

I waited to hear as a matter of opposition policy—and I agree with Senator Roblin that we cannot get into these financial questions too deeply, but we can as to fiscal planning—whether or not there should be a deficit and, if so, how much that deficit should be, and—

Senator Roblin: I covered that.

Senator Frith: —what relationship it should have to the gross national product—

Senator Roblin: You didn't listen very well.

Senator Frith: Yes, I did—and exactly how it would be reduced. The only suggestion I noted was that we must live within our means. Senator Roblin pointed out that that is one of the risks that you have in government. You have to plan on the basis of a budget; you have to take into account your estimates as to many factors, including the expansion of the economy; and, of course, the intention always is to live within the budget. However, there are factors that affect that. Certainly we can support that principle.

Ought we to reduce the deficit by increasing taxes? Senator Roblin said: If you increase taxes—

Senator Roblin: You have.

Senator Frith: He did not say that taxes ought to be increased. He did not say increasing taxes was part of the program to reduce the deficit, but if they are increased then what one should do is apply that increase to the deficit.

Another way of reducing the deficit would be to abolish these job-creation programs. Of course, that is pooh-poohed as slush.

Senator Roblin: First class slush!

Senator Frith: As I understand it, a number of people in the country will be interested to know that with respect to the job-creation programs, which are part of the budget and, therefore, relate to the deficit, that the opposition party thinks they are nothing but slush, and, therefore, I assume, ought to be cancelled.

As to whether or not we should reduce unemployment insurance benefits or old age pensions, or what form of government spending exactly we should reduce—we have not heard anything on that yet, but perhaps we will some day.

Senator Roblin: Start with Liberal patronage.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is all I have to say with reference to the intervention of Senator Roblin. Therefore, I recommend second reading of this bill, on the understanding, of course, that if it receives second reading I will propose that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance where many of the questions that have been raised in the debate can be asked of the minister and his departmental officials.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Roblin: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

PROHIBITED DEGREES OF MARRIAGE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill S-13, to consolidate and amend the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons.

He said: Honourable senators, I am grateful to Senator Asselin and other honourable senators for having given us the background of this bill. Bill S-13 is a bill to consolidate and amend the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons. I suggest that there are four principal reasons why this bill should gain your support. First, I point out that in Canada the law regarding prohibited degrees of marriage is ambiguous in that in the case of both divorce and adoption, it fails to deal clearly with the question of relationships. As an ever-increasing number of Canadians become affected by either divorce or adoption, the time has arrived for Parliament to step in and clarify these matters. A further inconsistency is that the present law allows a person to marry a nephew or niece of a deceased spouse, but, apparently, not the uncle or aunt of the deceased spouse. It is, in that respect, nonsensical.

● (1540)

The second and related reason, honourable senators, why this bill should commend itself to you is that it would update the law. Those of you who have been following the proceedings in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs with respect to its subject matter reference in this area will note that both witnesses so far, the lawyer and the geneticist, have recommended that the law be modernized. Parliament has done so in Australia with no adverse repercussions, political or otherwise. The time has come to do so here.

Bill S-13 would modernize our law in three ways. In the case of persons related by blood, it would reaffirm the law that persons may not marry if they are related lineally, that is, a parent and child, or if they are brothers and sisters, but it would otherwise relax the law to allow marriage between persons who are related as aunt and nephew or as uncle and niece.

In the case of persons related by marriage, it would relax the law by allowing a person who has lost a spouse by divorce to marry the same relatives of the former spouse as the law already allows when the spouse has been lost by death. This would be the brother or sister or the nephew or niece of the divorced spouse. The proposal would also allow a person to marry the uncle or aunt of the deceased or divorced spouse.

Further, by enacting that a relationship by adoption is no prohibition to marriage, the proposed legislation would move in the same direction as did the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in 1978 and as the courts have confirmed since that time in the Re Broddy case.

The third principal reason why this bill deserves your support is that it will make uniform across the country the law with respect to the degrees of relationship within which persons may not marry as well as establishing a common source for that law. At present the law in each province may vary slightly from the law in other provinces depending on the date on which the laws in this regard were introduced in the province and the source from which these laws were derived.

Honourable senators, the fourth and last principal reason why you should support this bill is that it will provide a solution to the problem of the ever-increasing number of private bills emanating from petitioners seeking exemptions from the public general law on marriage. By bringing in a new and liberalized régime, you will spare many couples the expense and uncertainty of presenting a petition and you will spare the Senate the time and the difficulty of entertaining the petitions presented.

Honourable senators, for the four reasons I have given you, I feel that Bill S-13 deserves your support. Professor H. Albert Hubbard, Q. C., Acting Dean of the Common Law Section of the Faculty of Law of the University of Ottawa, author of the article, "Marriage Prohibitions Adoption and Private Acts of Parliament: The Need for Reform," and a witness before your committee on the subject matter reference, says in concluding his article:

We are living in a time when marriage is not a condition of cohabitation. Our law on the prohibited degrees does not prevent people from living together outside the bonds of matrimony, and there is no longer any social stigma in their doing so. If they wish to get married, why prevent them, particularly when to do so is only to weaken the institution of marriage by threatening its relevance?

The reforms in question are unlikely to excite any more controversy here than they did in Australia. Indeed, were Parliament to reject such a reform, the private acts of exemption it has already passed would make a mockery of the general law by which everyone else would be expected to abide. Clearly, the time for reform of this anachronistic law has arrived.

Honourable senators, I recommend second reading of Bill S-13 to you so that it may then be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for detailed study.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, it would appear that this bill contemplates making it legal for a parent to marry an adopted child. Is that the present law?

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that that is the present law according to the Re Broddy case, and that case confirmed the action of our committee in 1978. However, in that respect, the intention of this proposed bill is purely to consolidate the law as it now stands. It will certainly be open to the committee to make whatever amendment it may wish to make to deal with that specific situation or any other specific situation.

Senator Godfrey: I have one other question and, although I am not a member of the committee, perhaps it would best be raised during the committee hearings. My question is: What was the reason for having a separate clause 2(1) and clause 3(1)? It seems to me they could have been put together with the insertion of "nor is a marriage between them invalid" in subclause 2(1).

Hon. Martial Asselin: Senator Godfrey will be able to make his case in committee.

Senator Godfrey: That is a drafting question.

Senator Asselin: Senator Stanbury is not a drafter.

Senator Stanbury: I invite honourable senators to attend the committee meetings and make suggestions as to amendments in the wording.

Senator Godfrey: I invite honourable senators on the committee to make a note of my remarks.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, when the subject matter which is responsible for this bill was before the Senate in a private bill on an earlier occasion, I rose and expressed my views with respect to the dispensation which was being sought: the exemption from the general regulation. I made it perfectly clear that, as far as I was concerned, it was not an exemption that should be granted lightly, that it was not an exemption that should even be considered. I went so far as to say that there might be certain cases where age or circumstances might justify departing from the norm and allowing the marriage to take place. In other words, I was prepared to consider each individual bill on its merits, and I was prepared to be somewhat lenient with respect to them.

At the time it was suggested that a bill such as we are now considering for second reading might be introduced and that its effect would be—as the honourable senator has said in advancing his fourth reason—to spare honourable senators the time and the difficulty of considering an ever-increasing number of private bills, and it would do so by the simple expedient of just removing the law, changing the law.

As I listened to Senator Stanbury, I found that what he really said was this: We have a problem here. We have to deal with it. There are many people who want to behave in a way that, up to this point, has never been considered ordinary or normal behaviour. He justifies it by the simple expedient of quoting a law professor who said that today we have reached the point where there is no stigma attached to living together without the benefit of matrimony. Well, that may be what the professor thinks; it may be what Senator Stanbury thinks; but it is certainly not what I think. I think that there is a stigma attached to people living together, and if that stigma is not such an active one as it used to be, if it is not fraught with the same dire consequences that it used to contain, then I still feel that it is not a practice that ought to be endorsed.

The honourable senator says that all we are doing is limiting the degree of kindred in which marriage is forbidden. He says that linear marriages still shall not take place; that a brother cannot marry a sister. Honourable senators, I do not propose to be long this afternoon but I merely want to say this: I was obliged to be absent from this chamber during the time the matter was being considered in committee. I understand that a number of meetings have been held, a number of witnesses were heard and some decisions were reached. One of those decisions was that at least twelve distinct and important religious denominations in this country should be contacted in writing by this committee in order that their views might be ascertained before the committee took action. I understand that they were so requested to express their opinions. I am a member of the committee and I did attend the last meeting at the first opportunity I had, and at that time no answers had been received from the denominations.

Honourable senators, we find ourselves in the exquisite position of saying that it is important to hear from the various religious denominations their views about this bill, but, on the other hand, that we should proceed before we give them any opportunity to respond.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is not what we are suggesting. The bill will be going to committee, senator.

Senator Donahoe: The deputy leader can say what he likes, but that is not what I understood at the meeting. Perhaps he can tell us what his understanding is.

Senator Frith: The bill will be sent to committee for that very purpose.

Senator Donahoe: The committee wants to seek the views of the twelve denominations. I understood that that request was made, but as a member of the committee I have not heard the view of one of those denominations. The answers have not yet been forthcoming. My honourable friend says to me that they will come, and I trust and hope that that is true. All I am saying is that we are acting on the matter before we get those opinions, so that when they come it will be like locking the stable after the horse has been stolen. It will not matter what their opinions are if we have already taken action on this bill. That is all I am saying.

Senator Frith: This is only second reading, senator. The bill will go to committee. It will not receive third reading until we have heard the opinions of those denominations.

Senator Donahoe: That may be. My honourable friend can say that we have not yet reached a final disposition of the matter and that there is still opportunity to take into account the views of those churches. The fact remains that we are making a substantial move in that direction and we are being urged very vigorously.

In any event, I merely want to conclude by saying that it is not denominational views or religion that motivate me in this matter. It is a question of culture. Honourable senators, in this day we hear a great deal about culture. We hear about the Indian culture, the black culture, various ethnic cultures. Culture is a matter of the greatest importance. This, to me, is a matter of Canadian culture. It may be the culture of other nations as well, but here in Canada we are being asked to authorize something which was not an accepted practice in times gone by. Today we are being asked to modify the law so as to make marriages of this kind an accepted practice. I, for one, do not feel that we ought to take the step in that direction. I can see that it might be possible to act as we are urged to act and to sweep the problem under the bed. We simply do not care about it. We are not concerned about marriages of this type because, after this bill is passed, they will not be against the law of Canada and therefore they will not come to our attention. We can then go comfortably on our way and think what fine fellows we are.

Honourable senators, that is not good enough for me. I am taking this first and earliest opportunity to express my opinion publicly and say that this is a retrograde step that we are being asked to take, that we are doing it for reasons of our own comfort, our own convenience and our own satisfaction. If we take this step, we will be departing from the norms of—I will not even say religion, but certainly from the norms of practice and culture. I see no reason why we should take this step.

I conclude by saying that the type of argument advanced with respect to this bill is essentially the same type of argument that has been advanced regarding other matters where we have been told not to be reactionary but to be more liberal. Those views prevail. They prevail in the case of abortions and they prevail in the case of divorces.

We may have saved a great deal of difficulty for the members of this chamber. I listened the other day to an impassioned appeal to the effect that the old law created great difficulties in the Senate and that now we are much smoother working since we do not have to consider those matters. That may very well be, but the fact remains that, in both cases where we allowed things to take place that have not previously been allowed, we succeeded in multiplying the number of abortions and the number of divorces. Here again, in my opinion, by removing what up to now has been a taboo, I think that we will encourage people to regard no longer in that way the kind of marriage that was once objectionable. I believe that that kind of marriage, which I find objectionable, will be bound to increase as a result of this bill and that the benefits to this chamber and to the men and women in it will be far outweighed by the damage that will be done to society.

I therefore want to make it clear at this early stage that I wish to have my name recorded as one of those deeply opposed to this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I will not of course discuss the principles which Senator Donahoe has just stated, because he has very long parliamentary experience; however, as Senator Frith has noted, we are at the second reading stage and we have emphasized that the churches should be consulted and asked whether they are interested in coming before the committee to express their views on this Bill.

I hope, and I may also be right in assuming that the various churches will take their responsibilities seriously and will come before the Senate and tell us what they think about the Bill now under consideration. We will then see whether we have to change anything in the Bill to remove some of the obstacles without offending anybody's sensibilities. I shall have other comments to add at the next sitting, and I therefore move that the debate be adjourned.

[English]

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, with the permission of Senator Asselin, I should like to make an observation before the debate is adjourned. I shall not be long.

I originally intended to rise, honourable senators, to make a comment apropos of the intervention of Senator Godfrey, who thought that the bill might be further abbreviated. I was going to make the comment that, compared with a great many bills that come before us in this chamber, this bill is admirably drafted. It says concisely what it attempts to do and I would be more inclined to congratulate the drafter of the bill than to criticize him. But if my good friend Senator Godfrey can further simplify it, I am sure that the benefit of his advice will be taken up in the committee.

As for the intervention of my friend, Senator Donahoe, I disagree totally with the attitude that he has taken. I do not think we are passing a bill primarily as a convenience to ourselves. Senator Stanbury did throw that in as his fourth point, but that is certainly not the important point at all.

Honourable senators, this is a good bill. It recognizes a situation which is approved by lawyers and geneticists today. I think it deserves second reading and eventual passing by this Parliament.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY*STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE VETERANS AFFAIRS EXPENDITURES IN ESTIMATES

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday I adjourned debate on this order in my name because I wanted to find out if the question had been discussed with the committee. I sent a note to Senator Marshall earlier this afternoon, asking him if it had the support of the committee. In his note back to me, he indicated that the chairman of the steering committee and the members of the committee all agree that this matter should be referred to the committee. Therefore, I see no reason why it should not go forward.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN YOUTH*MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hébert, seconded by the Honourable Senator Le Moynes:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Canadian youth between 15 and 24 years of age;

That the Committee be composed of 12 Senators to be designated at a later date;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than March 1, 1985, and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That the motion be amended in the first paragraph by

1) deleting the words "a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed" and substituting therefor the following words: "the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized", and

2) deleting all remaining paragraphs.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to speak briefly to this amendment and, inferentially, to the motion. If I understood Senator Marshall correctly, we can start on common ground, which is that he and I, and other senators, agree that this would be a worthwhile initiative by the Senate. He and I support the idea of the committee, as I believe do many honourable senators. The question before us, in the motion and amendment, is simply how we do it.

Senator Marshall made a good case for saying that it would be better to have this study referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology and that a subcommittee should be appointed to deal with it. There is a good deal of merit in that suggestion.

One of the reasons put forward by Senator Marshall is that we are up against a proliferation of committees and problems in manning them. Having given thought to the matter, a case could be made for having a special committee or a subcommittee. We agree on the objective. After more thought, I believe it would involve less trouble and be less burdensome if we had a separate special committee. If we proceed to deal with the matter by a subcommittee of the main committee, we would have to do as we did in connection with the Lamontagne report of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, which would be to increase the number of committee members so that there would be a sufficient number of senators to establish a subcommittee.

We have recently reduced our committee membership to what we consider to be a more manageable size, namely twelve. There would be no specific advantage in terms of funding, or of the number of members on the committee, and, in my view, it would be less difficult to proceed on the basis of a special committee. I must say that when the suggestion to have a subcommittee was first made, my reaction was favourable. However, on considering the matter, I suggest that we proceed with the original motion, namely, to have a special committee. We need not make it a large committee. We could obtain attendance commitments from senators who might be members of that committee. That would be a better procedure than asking the standing committee to prepare a budget for the subcommittee and do the other things that would have to be done. So I believe that the study could be more efficiently dealt with by a special committee. I do not suggest that we should vote now, but that is my position. I sympathize with Senator Marshall's views, but I believe that in the final analysis the best method would be to proceed by special committee.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I wish to support Senator Frith. I agree with what he has said. There is another advantage of having a separate committee. Senator Stanbury was chairman of a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The subcommittee spent some months studying its subject and brought in a report on which we thought there was unanimous agreement. The whole committee met as a matter of routine and, on the very last day, cut out three or four of our recommendations. They had not attended any of our meetings, but they were lobbied by a few people. Therefore the original report of Senator Stanbury's committee did not reach the house. I believe that was regrettable. That would not happen by our having a separate committee.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1984-85

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Thursday, April 5, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance presents its

THIRD REPORT

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which was referred Bill C-21, "An Act to provide borrowing authority", has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, April 4, 1984, examined the said Bill and reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

C. WILLIAM DOODY
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, at the meeting of the committee earlier today I undertook to determine how the minister expressed his answer to a question raised in committee, the essence of which was the basis for the projections on interest costs with respect to the deficit and the public debt.

During a meeting of the committee of the other place, the Honourable John Crosbie asked, in effect, the same question Senator Phillips asked this morning. The Minister of Finance at that time stated:

You have been the Minister of Finance, Mr. Crosbie, and you know that these figures have never been revealed, and I do not intend to reveal them. They would lead to speculation as to the forecast of interest rates in Canada by the government and as to forecasts on exchange rates by the Department of Finance, and I do not think that that is a step I would like to take.

The expansion on that takes place on the next page, where the minister stated:

Mr. Chairman, the reason is that I do not want to interfere with the market. I will let the speculators and the forecasters go to their job of trying to guess what interest rates and exchange rates will be over the next few years. The United States government, indeed, is producing those figures. We have to remind ourselves that the United States has the main currency in the world, is the leader. We are not in that position as a country, and I will not change that policy.

Honourable senators, just in case that answer is not perfectly satisfactory, Senator Doody, the Chairman of the National Finance Committee—and he can correct me if I am wrong—has been instructed by the committee to write to the minister asking for an explanation.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to add. I ask you to support the bill on third reading.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I was surprised when the deputy leader said that that reply was by the Minister of Finance, because the Minister of Finance did not appear before the committee this morning, but the Minister of State (Finance) did. I was in attendance while the minister was there and he did not reply to any of the questions; he handed all the questions over to his officials. The reply, which is a "No", given by the deputy leader was a reply given by the Minister of Finance and not the Minister of State (Finance). It does not add very much that way.

Senator Frith: That is quite right. The minister who appeared before the committee was the Minister of State (Finance), the Honourable Roy MacLaren. When the question was asked later of the officials, the officials referred to the minister and we did not ask which minister. After looking it up I discovered it was the Minister of Finance.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to make one comment on Bill C-21 before we pass it. I am concerned over the format of the borrowing bills. Last year the committee was successful in persuading the Department of Finance to add a third clause to the format of the bill which, in effect, limited the unused spending authority. However, there is still a great deal of confusion about the actual amount of money the government borrows over a year. This particular bill asks for authority to borrow $24.55 billion, which is a net amount. It has been said that it might be more appropriate that the total amount of borrowing, if not included in the bill, at least be added as an appendix.

The amount of information that accompanies a borrowing bill is really inappropriate in light of the amount of money that is actually borrowed. Some extra data should be included to indicate, for example, that the amount requested is in excess of the amount of money needed to roll over maturing bonds. The amount of money the government may have to borrow this year to roll over bonds could be in excess of $140 billion, and it may require new borrowing authority as well.

This concern has been expressed before. I wanted to bring it to the attention of the house in the hope that the government will see fit in future years to give that sort of information. Perhaps the size of the accumulated debt as well as the total borrowing amount for the year along with the net borrowing amount, which is what we see in these bills, could be included.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have some observations to make on this bill before it passes. This bill received a rather rough ride when it was in the other place and it does not deserve a much better reception here. Indeed, it did not get a very good reception yesterday from the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. It took some weeks to get this bill through the other place. One sometimes hears impatience expressed here and there over the length of debates and the time it takes to get various government measures through, but this bill is an excellent illustration of the good purpose that can be served by a debate which superficially may appear to be overly long.

Between the introduction of this bill on March 7 and its passage a couple of days ago, the government agreed to a reduction of some $5 billion in the borrowing authority sought in the bill. For this the taxpayers of Canada have Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the other place to thank. It is not necessarily a saving of $5 billion, but a reduction of $5 billion in the borrowing authority being sought. This bill in its original form was the biggest borrowing bill in Canadian history and even with the reduction of $5 billion it is still the biggest borrowing bill in Canadian history. What happened initially is that the government gave itself a cushion of at least $4 billion in that the borrowing authority sought was higher than the stated financial requirements of the government by at least that amount. They had left themselves a contingency fund of some $4 billion.

I wondered then, and I continue to do so, whether the contingency fund of $4 billion was put there because the Honourable Marc Lalonde knows that the deficit projection he made in his budget is too low and is almost certain to be exceeded, and that, therefore, he would need the money, or whether, in fact, the government was thinking in terms of some kind of a slush fund to finance a give-away program in the general election that will probably be held during the current fiscal year.

• (1410)

I admit that the Minister of State for Finance, Mr. MacLaren, when he introduced this bill in the other place, and the Deputy Leader of the Government when he introduced the bill here, provided explanations which were superficially plausible as to why this contingency fund—this cushion—had been sought. Indeed, Mr. MacLaren went further in giving what I am sure were quite sincere undertakings on his part to the effect that the money would only be used in ways which had already been authorized by Parliament. Of course, these undertakings would be regarded much more seriously—might even be accepted—if they came from any government but this one, which has such a lamentable record when it comes to honouring undertakings of this type.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): They have a very unreliable memory as well.

Senator Murray: As the Leader of the Opposition reminds us, it is a government which has a very poor and unreliable memory.

Indeed, the Auditor General has found that this is a government which has understated its liabilities and overstated its assets rather remarkably. He has found that it has understated the total debt of the country by $20 billion. I believe that is the amount. He has found that this government has described as loans and advances, payouts that are really expenditures, by the federal government that will never be recovered. With that record this government cannot expect to be taken seriously when it gives undertakings with respect to the legitimate uses to which it would put a $4 billion contingency fund, especially in an election year.

Having said that, the $24.5 billion, for which borrowing authority is being sought through this bill, will not be borrowed cheaply. I think it is instructive to recall that only a couple of weeks ago Mr. Lalonde announced a new issue of non-callable Government of Canada bonds in the total amount of $850 million. The details of that issue were contained in press releases dated March 19, March 20 and March 21 under the name of the the Minister of Finance.

Briefly, what will happen is that of the $850 million the Bank of Canada will take up $250 million, which is slightly less than the $328 million of Bank-of-Canada-held bonds which will mature April 1. What is most important to look at are the amounts, the interest rates and maturity dates with respect to the $850 million. There is $150 million bearing an interest rate of 12 per cent which will mature on November 15, 1987, some three years hence. There is $200 million bearing an interest rate of 12.5 per cent which will mature on March 15, 1989. There is $250 million at an interest rate of 13 per cent which will mature April 1, 1994—ten-year money. Finally, there is $250 million at an interest rate of 13.5 per cent which will mature June 1 in the year 2004—20-year money.

What this says is that the government is paying up to 8 per cent more than the rate of inflation for its money. It is paying anywhere from 1.25 per cent to 3.25 per cent higher than the current bank rate for its money.

I think it is fairly well known that other bonds are based on Government of Canada issues. The rates for bonds put out by the provinces, for example, or by the triple A borrowers, are set on the basis of the interest rates on Government of Canada bonds. Historically, I am informed, these other borrowers would be paying about one-half of 1 per cent higher interest rates than the Government of Canada would be paying. It is interesting to note that the spread between what the Government of Canada pays and what these other borrowers pay has somewhat narrowed. In other words, those other borrowers, typically, are not paying one-half of 1 per cent more, but one-quarter of 1 per cent more. The federal government has lost about half of its historic advantage in recent times.

In some areas—again I am informed by people who know the market a lot better than I do—the government has totally lost its advantage in terms of three-month treasury bills. Some provinces are able to raise money as cheaply as the Government of Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is unheard of.

Senator Murray: The Deputy Leader of the Opposition, who has had some experience in this field as a provincial premier, says that it is unheard of.

The question before us is: Why is the Government of Canada paying so dearly for its money? It is not, I suggest, because of crowding in the sense that there is a supply and demand problem. Indeed, in the answer tabled by the Leader of the Government yesterday to some questions Senator Roblin and I had placed, I believe it is stated that the system is quite liquid, so there is no crowding in that sense. There is no supply and demand problem.

The problem for the Government of Canada seems to be that it is coming to the market so often and for such large amounts. The joke in some circles is that waiting for a Government of Canada borrowing is like waiting for a Toronto subway train: if you should miss one, don't worry, there will be another along in a few minutes. With that type of psychology, it is very easy to understand why the government is forced to pay quite high rates for its money.

The government does not have much choice about the timing of its refinancing. Its previous budgetary policies oblige it to refinance. There is no particular discipline at work in the government.

Certainly, in terms of raising consumer dollars with such issues as Canada Savings Bonds, what appears to happen is that the government comes in and looks at what is being paid in the private sector and offers more. In all those ways the Government of Canada is acting as an interest-rate leader, not as a follower. It is coming in at the top of the market. This has not been the normal situation in this country, although it has become all too normal with this government.

Government borrowings are helping mightily to saddle the economy with a high interest rate structure. The reason why people are demanding such interest for their money is that inflation psychology in this country is still very strong. When people will not accept less than 12 per cent for their money on a three-year federal government bond at a time when the Minister of Finance is saying that inflation is going to remain in the 5 per cent range; when people will not accept less than 13 per cent on a 10-year federal government bond; and when people will not accept less than 13 ½ per cent on a 20-year federal government bond, it is clear that people expect that inflation and interest rates will continue to remain very high.

It is clear that people do not believe the government when it says it will restrain spending and bring about annual reductions in the deficit. People have excellent reason for not believing this government when it says those things. I will come back to that topic later.

I ask the Senate to consider the impact of these borrowings on future budgets. The government is building in historically-high, indeed unprecedented, debt-servicing costs into future budgets. As Senator Roblin pointed out yesterday, one dollar in every three that they raise in revenue is going to service the debt. One dollar in every five that the government spends is going to service the debt. I had planned to ask the question whether we were heading for a situation where 25 or 30 per cent of the budget would be spent in servicing the debt, and Senator Roblin has seen some fairly good arithmetic projecting forward on the basis of current trends that indicates that if the current trends are maintained we will be spending 40 per cent of the federal budget just to service the debt. That is the grim situation into which this country seems to be heading today. The kind of debt servicing costs that are being built into future budgets are simply horrendous.

As we just discovered in Question Period, it does not seem to be possible to find out the basis of interest rates on which the government is now estimating the debt servicing component of future budgets. Nobody but the Minister of Finance seems to know, and he will not tell. The estimates tabled for the current fiscal year by Mr. Gray make this simple reference to it:

The most important element, however, producing changes in public debt charges within the medium-term is interest rates, which are vulnerable to changes in international monetary conditions and domestic inflation. As a result, the level of public debt charges for 1984-85 should be viewed simply as a projection based on certain interest rate assumptions rather than as planned expenditures.

We would like to know what those certain interest rate assumptions are. We think that Parliament and the country have a right to know what they are. Sooner or later, be it in a brown envelope, we are going to find out and place it on the record if the government does not come clean.

At a little past noon today the bank rate went up another three basis points, not as large an increase as those we have known in previous weeks, but still a continuation of a trend that has been going on for six or eight weeks. I would still like to know from the government—and perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government can elucidate when he rises to close the debate on third reading—what its position is in these matters. The government is fond of throwing up its hands on occasions like this and saying that we are tied to the American rate and that we are the helpless, if not hapless, victims of what is happening in the United States. I have to observe that within the last day or so to the American banks have raised their prime rate to 12 per cent. Our prime rate is at 11.5 per cent. Perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government can tell us whether it is the government's view that the prime rate in Canada, which has been reaching for 12 per cent, is now going to go to 12 per cent or higher, or whether in the government's view, since this is a "temporary mutation," to quote the deputy leader from the debate a couple of weeks ago, we will be able to maintain this half point spread between the prime rate here and that of the United States.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the real bank rate, that is, the difference between the rate of inflation and the bank rate, because while honourable senators opposite sometimes take some pleasure in the fact that interest rates have not in the past couple of months reached the horrendously high levels of 19 to 21 per cent that existed some months ago, the real bank rate is still very high.

If honourable senators take the real bank rate—again, the rate of inflation minus the bank rate—they will find that in 1980, at the end of December, it was 6.08 per cent. All of these figures are taken from the end of December in the relevant year. In 1981, it was 2.56 per cent; in 1982, 0.75 per cent; in 1983, 5.46 per cent; in February 1984, 4.54 per cent; and most recently it was somewhere in the neighbourhood of 5.26 per cent. My most recent figure is not completely up to date because I have not calculated it on the basis of the increase in the bank rate today. It was not always so that the real bank rate and real interest rates were so high. There have been times, even during this government, in the early 1970s, when real interest rates were negative. Again, the real bank rate in 1973 was 2.05 per cent below the rate of inflation. In 1974, the real bank rate was minus 3.55 per cent; in 1975, it was minus 0.5 per cent.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada is fond of saying that real interest rates should not be calculated by subtracting the rate of inflation from interest rates. I have a quotation from a speech that he gave last December to the Investment Dealers Association. He said:

But the "real" rates of interest that matter are the calculations made by potential investors and potential borrowers when they subtract their expectations about future inflation from the interest rates they expect to receive or pay in future years. To the extent that expectations of inflation of borrowers and lenders remain rather pessimistic, "real" rates of interest for them are not as high as the usual calculations would suggest. This is just another way of saying that pessimistic expectations of inflation by borrowers and lenders work to keep nominal interest rates up.

[Senator Murray.]

If we look at the figures that I placed on the record a few moments ago, as to what the Government of Canada is having to pay for its money—in effect, what people are demanding to be paid for lending their money to the Government of Canada—we can reach no other conclusion but that people expect the rate of inflation and real interest rates to remain very high indeed. So we have high real interest rates, whether we achieve them by subtracting the rate of inflation and the nominal interest rates, or by looking at what borrowers and investors think is going to happen in the market—which is Governor Bouey's definition. We have very high real interest rates, and those show every indication of remaining very high.

The problem, as I indicated to the government, is that the people do not believe the government and the government's projections in terms of inflation, interest rates, restraint, and the size of the deficit. This government has made multi-year forecasts about the size of the federal deficit, forecasts which are increased every time they are made, and they are almost always exceeded when the particular year is over. But notwithstanding that record, the Honourable Marc Lalonde is still projecting year over year reductions in the federal deficit. For example, he says that in 1984-85 the federal deficit will be $29.6 billion. This is based on a projected rate of real economic growth of 4.9 per cent, which almost no one outside the government believes will be achieved. Even within the government, if you look at the projections made by the Department of Regional and Industrial Economic Expansion, and if you look at the statistics from Statistics Canada in terms of expected business capital investment, which is an extremely important part of any recovery, you will find that they are all projecting a decline, whereas Mr. Lalonde persists, in the face of all of the evidence, in his projection that business capital investment will show a healthy increase.

The recovery, then, is faltering. Of course, this poses a further threat to the size of the deficit and to interest rates. As the recovery falters, revenues will be down, expenditures of the safety net category will be up, the deficit will be higher than forecast, the borrowing requirements will be higher than forecast, and interest rates will rise with the consequent result of the stifling of economic growth and investment. Even if luck should be with us, however, on economic growth and, therefore, on government revenues, it is the spending forecasts that have been put forward by Mr. Lalonde that I wish to take issue with today. I say that those spending forecasts by Mr. Lalonde are fanciful, if not fraudulent.

The Finance Minister projects that this year, and in each of the succeeding three fiscal years, the increase in federal government spending will be lower than the increase in nominal gross national product. He says that in 1984-85, nominal GNP will increase by 10.3 per cent while spending will increase by 9.2 per cent; that in 1985-86, nominal GNP will increase by 9.3 per cent while spending will increase by 6.6 per cent; that in 1986-87, nominal GNP will go up by 9.1 per cent while spending will go up by 5.8 per cent; and that in 1987-88, according to Mr. Lalonde, nominal GNP will go up by 8.5 per cent while spending will go up by 6 per cent. Those are the fanciful forecasts produced by Mr. Lalonde in respect of years to come.

I suggest that it is obvious that his whole fiscal plan and his projections will come tumbling down if those forecasts are not realized. If honourable senators look at the fanciful forecasts for future years and compare them with the reality of the years just past, they will see how readily Mr. Lalonde's house of cards is going to come tumbling down. At no time has the increase in government spending been below the nominal GNP increase. In 1980-81, nominal GNP increased by 13.9 per cent while spending was up by 15.2 per cent. In 1981-82, nominal GNP increased by 14.3 per cent while spending went up by 15.9 per cent. In 1982-83, nominal GNP went up by 5.2 per cent while spending went up by 18.2 per cent. In 1983-84, nominal GNP went up by 9.2 per cent while spending increased by 9.8 per cent.

Since the Trudeau government took office in 1968, it has never held its annual expenditure increases below 8 per cent. We are now asked by Mr. Lalonde to believe that the government will keep its annual increases to somewhere in the range of 6 per cent in each of the next three or four fiscal years. The government, as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition pointed out yesterday, has virtually never met its own spending forecasts and has almost always exceeded them. This, then, is the mess that a new government is going to inherit. Nobody pretends that it will not take a great deal of time and a great deal of effort to clean it up.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Let's hear your program!

Senator Murray: I am interested to hear interjections and questions coming from the former Minister of Finance for Saskatchewan—

Senator Steuart: We were tough.

Senator Murray: "Tough", he says. He was the provincial treasurer in the most troglodytic, reactionary government that Canada has ever seen. "Tough" is not the word for it.

Senator Steuart: We believed that—

Senator Murray: The honourable senator will have an opportunity to make his speech before debate is closed.

The most important asset that a new government will have at the beginning of its mandate, at any rate, is its credibility.

Senator Steuart: What is your program?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What is Turner's program? What is your program?

Senator Murray: If a new government not only says that it will gradually reduce the deficit, year over year, but proceeds to do so; if a new government not only says that it will reduce the rate of increase in government spending—and I trust the honourable senator is not suggesting that that cannot be done. As a man who was tough when he was the provincial treasurer in Saskatchewan, I am sure the honourable senator will agree that it can be done. Perhaps the government should seek the honourable senator's advice.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: It was not done in New Brunswick when you were there.

Senator Murray: My honourable friend Senator Thériault has fought four elections on that issue, and he lost every one of them, down there in New Brunswick.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we should have a look at your record.

Senator Murray: If a government says it will take measures and does, indeed, take measures to cut out the flim-flam, such as overstating its assets, as this government was found to do by the Auditor General; calling such things that are expenditures and money that will never be returned loans and advances; and understating the net debt, as it has been caught doing by the Auditor General of Canada—Senator Steuart must know that the managers of a company in the private sector who did the things I have just described would be in jail. However, in the Government of Canada, they seem to be able to get away with it.

If the new government will do these things, its credibility will be enhanced and the marketplace will make a positive judgment when it comes to government borrowings. The marketplace will also make subsequent and consequent judgments when it comes to other wage and price decisions that are settled in the private sector, and the electorate will ultimately make a positive judgment, in the same way as the marketplace has made, within the past couple of weeks, a negative judgment on the credibility of the present government, just as the electorate awaits only the opportunity to render the same kind of verdict.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I would like to ask my honourable friend, Senator Murray, a question. He said that the government has been wrong in its projection of interest rates and that they have always been wrong. Yet we heard from the deputy leader today that they do not publicize any projection of interest rates. How do you know that they have been wrong when they do not tell us what their projections are?

Senator Murray: I said that the government is wrong on the record. The government is understating its own expenditure forecasts. I did not say anything about its expected interest rates, but I do say that 20 to 25 cents out of every dollar which the government is spending goes toward servicing the national debt. I repeat the projection made by Senator Roblin that, if present trends continue, it will come to 40 per cent of the budget.

Senator Thériault: I would like to ask Senator Murray a question. Is it 20 per cent or 25 per cent that is being paid for the servicing of the debt? Five per cent of $150 billion makes quite a difference. Can Senator Murray tell us whether it is 20 per cent or 25 per cent?

Senator Murray: It depends on whether you accept the statements contained in the estimates tabled by the Honourable Herbert Gray some time ago, or whether you try to add on to that—

Senator Thériault: How do you know whether it is 20 or 25 per cent? Perhaps it is 35 per cent?

Senator Murray: I can find the exact figure if my honourable friend is interested in it, but I think he will find that it is closer to 25 per cent than to 20 per cent.

Senator Thériault: You say it is 25 per cent. For the record, you say it is 25 per cent. I will come back with the figures.

● (1440)

Senator Murray: It is closer to 25 per cent than it is to 20 per cent, based on the word of Mr. Gray, but I will also look at Mr. Lalonde's forecasts.

Senator Flynn: Do you know what it is?

Senator Thériault: Sure.

Senator Flynn: Then put that on the record.

Senator Thériault: You have been using figures of 30 per cent, 40 per cent and 50 per cent when it is actually less than 20 per cent.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray invited the deputy leader to respond to a number of his questions. Senator Murray knows that it is not customary for the sponsor of the bill to close the debate on third reading. Senator Murray is in the habit of complaining a great deal and using the Murray Selective Bureau of Statistics to support his claims.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That is what Paul Martin used to do.

Senator Olson: I would almost believe he might have been here then, and learned some of the techniques from those days.

Senator Asselin: I was here then and I did not learn anything from Paul Martin.

Senator Olson: Senator Murray is obviously too young to remember that, but perhaps Senator Asselin has been training him.

In this particular instance, Senator Murray has conveniently left out, when he knows better, because I am sure that with all of the documents he has looked at—

Senator Steuart: What's your policy? What do you stand for?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Oh, be a sport.

Senator Olson: All right. We will be charitable today.

When Senator Murray criticized the Minister of Finance for forecasting somewhat different from the way things turned out, he forgot to say that the growth in the economy by several of the indicators was in fact better than the Minister of Finance had forecast in the budget of April of 1983. I wonder why he did not say that, because Senator Murray is usually very careful when researching.

Senator Murray: Can you give us the expenditures on some of the safety net categories?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Olson: Senator Murray rose in the chamber today and said things that are absolutely contrary to the truth, things that are 180 degrees from the truth. I am sure that he is clever enough to have recognized that.

I do not want to get into the details, because they have been explained to Senator Murray by the Minister of State (Finance), and he admitted that. Indeed, there were several other places where Senator Murray found explanations, but he left out certain things in his comments. For example, he did not tell us what his or his party's policy is with respect to interest rates.

When he says that interest rates in the United States are now moving slightly ahead of interest rates in Canada—I think he said 11.5 to 12 per cent—is he suggesting that he or his party would like to insulate or isolate the Canadian financial structure from that of the United States? If he is saying that, let us hear him say that unequivocally, because that is the implication he has tried to leave. I think that the financial community ought to know that that is what he and his party stand for. If he is going to make those kinds of arguments surely he should be honest enough to say that that is where he stands and not garble it up with the criticism he has given here.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, recently I was given a statement that deals with the percentages of public debt charges for 1983-84 and 1984-85. While I am not entitled to speak again on this motion on third reading, since I have already spoken, it might be worthwhile if I read these figures and put the total on the record. We will then have the figures that Senator Thériault, in particular, was asking about.

Senator Roblin: I think it would be more suitable if my friend tabled that document because otherwise he does engage for a second time in the debate on third reading.

Senator Frith: The question of reading them was an offer; not a request nor even a suggestion.

So, honourable senators, I suggest that this document be appended to Debates of the Senate of today.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, perhaps this is not the best day to rise having regard for the rather testy mood in the Senate this afternoon. Even some of the intellectual pygmies in the back row are participating today.

Senator Frith: Only the Einstein of the Progressive Conservative Party can say that.

Senator Phillips: My disciple, when introducing Bill C-21, repeated time and time again that this was a bill asking merely for borrowing authority, and that there was no spending involved. The honourable senator, when sponsoring the bill, forgot to tell us what the government was going to do with it. He left the impression that the government was merely borrowing this money from the taxpayers and salting it away in a blue chip stock, something like CDIC, where it would grow and pay dividends. Unfortunately, honourable senators, that is not the case.

Senator Frith: Neither is it the case that that is what I said.

Senator Phillips: The bill really starts the government off on another year of waste and extravagance.

This morning in the meeting of the National Finance Committee the Leader of the Opposition asked what was left of the billions of dollars of borrowing authority the government received last year. Honourable senators, despite the fact that they were all introduced as non-spending borrowing bills, there is only $50 million left that the government has not used of the billions of dollars it received last year. I think for that reason this bill should receive more attention than it has received throughout the whole of Parliament.

Senator Kelly raised a very interesting question this morning when he asked where the losses for Canadair were being registered. Honourable senators, that did not even occur to the Department of Finance; they had not decided where to enter those extravagant losses in the Public Accounts, yet those on the other side seem to think that the blue book is authoritative.

Honourable senators, the government just cannot find a burial place for Senator Austin's mistakes.

I was going to spend some time on the cost of servicing the public debt, but Senator Murray has covered that subject. It is becoming a matter of public concern. Even the Liberal leadership candidates know it is a matter of some concern. I have found out around here over the years that the last people to realize a matter is of public urgency are Liberal cabinet ministers, and since most of the cabinet is running, or have aspirations of running, it must be getting through to the cabinet that the servicing of the debt is becoming a major factor in our deficits.

The cost of servicing the debt, as Senator Murray has stated, has been increased by the recent increases in interest rates. In preparing the budget the minister cannot say that interest rates will be at a certain percentage for the year and make his calculations on that basis alone because the debt becomes due at various times in the year. At one point in the year the interest rate may be 12 per cent and at another point it may be 13 per cent. As Senator Murray has pointed out, determining how much money is needed to refinance the debt depends on the term of the bond issue.

This morning in committee I requested the interest rate used in calculating the cost of servicing the debt. I was referred to the minister's statement made in the House of Commons. I understand the Deputy Leader of the Government, my disciple, read this into the record earlier. I am sorry I wasted the time of the committee because there was really nothing in the minister's statement. For some strange reason the government is determined to keep the interest rate a secret. The interest rate is more carefully guarded than anything in the Department of National Defence. We are being asked to approve a budget, a deficit and a borrowing authority bill, and the government says, "Don't ask us what the interest rate is; that is a state secret." The only reason given by the Minister of State for Finance is that people might deduce what the government's thinking is, which might affect the marketplace.

Surely people can get some idea of what the government is thinking. It is not what the government thinks or says that gives me ulcers; it is what the government does that gives me ulcers. The thinking and the actions of the government are not synonymous. They say one thing and do the opposite. Perhaps the saddest thing about all the secrecy on interest rates is that if the Minister of Finance did tell us the interest rates I do not know of anyone who would believe him because we have had so many miscalculations and so many attempts to cover up mistakes that people no longer accept anything the minister has to say.

In the United States interest rates are projected nine years ahead, and in Great Britain, with a Parliament upon which ours is supposed to be modelled, interest rates are available to the public.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: With total inaccuracy in both countries, as the record shows.

Senator Phillips: I suppose I could say the same thing about inaccuracy of the records around here, except that it is much more extensive than in the United States and Great Britain.

Senator Gigantès: Then why do you want us to imitate these countries in their inaccuracies?

Senator Phillips: If the honourable senator will just be patient, I will tell him. I do not know whether he has any other way to waste his time; I am sure that he does not, so he might as well sit and listen.

Senator Murray referred to the interest rates on Canada Savings Bonds. Surely it must be some indication of the government's thinking when it is paying in excess of 13 per cent on a bond issue. If it is paying 12.25 per cent to borrow money for one year, that must be a slight indication of the government's thinking. The finance critic for the opposition party in the other place made calculations to the effect that the government and the Minister of Finance in preparing the budget used an interest rate of 7.5 per cent. At the present interest rate level, that has the effect of hiding several billion dollars of deficit, and borrowing on non-budgetary accounts would have to increase by at least $3 billion. Perhaps it is unfair to suggest that this was deliberately done because it is an election year and the government wishes to reduce the deficit, but I think that that is exactly what has happened, and time will prove that statement to be right. Senator Murray said that the practice is fraudulent; I agree. If the Minister of Justice were to give up his hopeless cause—not even St. Jude can help that one—he would probably be prosecuting the Minister of Finance for election fraud because you cannot bury or lose $8 billion in that way.

It was interesting to note that not one Liberal member of the House of Commons considered the issue raised by the opposition critic; not one of them asked, "Are your calculations based on an honest interest rate?" They were silent because they did not want the public to find out that the deficit will be $6 or $7 billion higher than the forecast. Their attitude was leave it to John—not John Turner but John Crosbie—this fall.

Senator Thériault: The other John.

Senator Phillips: Yes, the other John. In the past I have known a good many Liberal senators whom I came to respect greatly. I am thinking of Senator Alexander McLean from New Brunswick, who followed the finances of the country through this chamber, Senator D'arcy Leonard, who was Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee for years when I was a member of it, and Senator John Connolly. I do not think any of those former colleagues would have been ready to agree to a practice such as was exercised in preparing this budget. I had hoped that some of their respectability would brush off on the Liberal senators opposite.

In any event, I am satisfied that I will not get the interest rate from the government. I can calculate fairly closely what it is, but I am concerned about one of the Liberal leadership candidates, the one whom Senator Frith is supporting. He is advocating new policies, all admirable policies, such as a reduction in the deficit, but I do not understand how Mr. Turner can develop those new policies based on the inaccurate projection used in the budget. I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government, if he will not tell the Senate the interest rate used in calculating the budget, to be kind enough to at least tell the leadership aspirant that he is supporting.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Phillips. Just so I will not have a worrisome and perhaps—

Senator Roblin: —sleepless night?

Senator Frith: Yes, a sleepless and embarrassing weekend if I spend it among my colleagues in the Liberal Party. Will he tell me in what respect I am alleged to be his disciple?

Senator Phillips: I am sorry that the honourable senator has such a short memory. It was only a week ago that he acknowledged me as swami, and that makes him my disciple.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

APPEARANCE OF MR. ZEHDI TERZI, PERMANENT OBSERVER OF THE PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION TO THE UNITED NATIONS BEFORE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I wish to point out that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs met this morning to hear a representative of the Palestine Liberation Organization, Mr. Zehdi Terzi, who is their permanent observer at the United Nations in New York. Before taking the evidence of witness Terzi, the Chairman of the committee made a statement which I think speaks for itself and which will be of interest to honourable senators and ought to be written into our record.

The reason Senator van Roggen is not making this report himself is that he was urgently required to return to Vancouver and could not attend today's sitting. Therefore, I shall read the statement he made:

THE CHAIRMAN: We will continue with our study of Canada's relations with the countries of the Middle East and North Africa. However, before we start, if honourable senators will permit me, I would like to make a short statement in view of the exceptional interest which has been shown by the public and the media as a result of our meeting today.

I do not quarrel with the editorial judgment of any of our newspapers; but in an editorial which I read this morning it was stated that Mr. Terzi is the final witness to appear before our committee and that no high Israeli government official has been heard. It was further stated that the committee had left itself, seemingly, predisposed in favour of the PLO as against Israel.

First, I wish to put on the record the fact that the advice to me, insofar as inviting an ambassador to appear before this committee is concerned, was that you sound the person out before issuing an invitation. In that fashion the person receives the invitation only if he so wishes. I suppose it is not unlike a government issuing an invitation to The Queen. That was the procedure followed by the staff of this committee with respect to the Israeli ambassador. It seems there was some confusion as to whether he was to be free to appear in camera. However, I simply wish to state for the record that we, as a committee,—and I am sure I speak for every member of the committee,—would be only too delighted if the new Israeli ambassador wished to meet with the committee either publicly or in camera. Of course, that is his choice; we would not presume to summon him as a witness as an ambassador of a sovereign foreign state. Other ambassadors have come at their own request.

At this point, Senator Bosa intervened to ask if the Chairman would invite the Israeli ambassador to appear before the committee and the Chairman replied:

I will certainly see that it is conveyed to him in writing, subject, of course, to the diplomatic niceties.

There has been a great deal of talk about this meeting being the last meeting—it is the last scheduled meeting. I wish to reiterate what I have already said, that is, that during the course of preparing our report we may wish to hear other witnesses in order to clarify individual points for whatever reason; there is nothing precluding that.

Dealing with the statement that we have not heard from senior Israeli officials other than the ambassador, I would draw the media's attention to the fact that the subcommittee of this committee which traveled to the Middle East consisted of seven out of the twelve members of this committee. Unfortunately, one of the seven, myself, was taken ill at the last minute and could not go. However, half of the whole committee did go—I might say it was the most active half, with one or two exceptions. When in the Middle East, the subcommittee saw senior people in all the countries they visited, but, in particular, in Israel where they were for some seven days altogether. Some of that time was spent in the Golan and the West Bank. There was a meeting with Israeli officials, a lengthy meeting with Prime Minister of Israel, a lengthy meeting with nine members of the Knesset, including the Speaker; a meeting of one-and-a-half hour's length took place with the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee; a separate meeting was held with Labour members of the Foreign Affairs Committee; a meeting was held with the foreign policy advisor of the Mayor of Jerusalem and an official of the ministry of foreign affairs, which lasted some one-and-a-half hours. There was a defence briefing, which lasted one hour, with two officials from the Ministry of Defence. A military intelligence briefing, which lasted one-and-a-half hours, took place. Numerous Jewish settlers from the settlements on the West Bank met with the committee. A dinner with ten senior Israeli businessmen was held, as well as meetings with former Labour Prime Minister Rabin. These were just some of the meetings held while the subcommittee was in Israel, many of which, as you can see, were at the highest possible level.

The meetings held with members of the PLO while in that region consisted of two, a meeting in Damascus with the Speaker of the Palestinian National Council, Mr. Fahoum, and a meeting in Amman with the PLO representative in Jordan, Mr. Yehya.

It has been the objective of this committee from the beginning, and one which I think we have discharged, to be balanced in the testimony we have sought with respect to the particular study before us. I believe we have accomplished that end.

The report of the subcommittee, when it returned from the Middle East, which is now in the public domain, was tabled a few weeks ago before the committee. It is a report of some 46 pages. I am told it was described by a member of the staff of the Canada-Israel Committee as being both solid and balanced. I would invite anyone to read and study that interim report of the traveling committee.

The second item I would like to touch on very quickly is the suggestion that having the witness before us whom we have today has somehow altered the formal position of the Government of Canada relative to the PLO. Of course, anyone who knows our constitutional system understands that is simply not the case. Mr. MacEachen and the Prime Minister have both enunciated the position that in Canada we do not recognize the PLO formally at a ministerial or governmental level. I believe I can say that position is similar to the one taken by the Official Opposition. However, Mr. MacEachen said before this committee that contacts are maintained at lower levels in his department in various places and at various times on different subjects with the PLO. Recently, we have heard that the same situation applies in the Reagan administration. Certainly, we know that Mr. Stanfield, a former Leader of the Opposition, who was a special emissary, or envoy, on behalf of the then Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Clark, on his visit to the Middle East met with the PLO. So it is obvious that a witness appearing before this committee does not change the formal legal position of the Government of Canada in any way. I wish to make that quite clear.

One last item which I might mention is that it is quite wrong to suggest that the government in some way controls the activities of this, or any, Senate committee, or dictates which witnesses this committee should see or may see. We are masters in our own house and conduct our own affairs. I hope that will always be the case.

That was the statement made by Senator van Roggen, the Chairman of the committee, at the opening of the session this morning. The committee proceeded to hear Mr. Terzi, who proved to be a very vocal exponent of the views of the Palestine Liberation Organization. He was cross-examined at length—sometimes critically—by every single member of the committee.

In summary, I think it was a good thing that the committee heard evidence from the Palestine Liberation Organization, which, whether we like it or not, is the legitimate spokesman, or the recognized spokesman, for the Palestinian people.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of the fact that Senator Hicks has made a fairly definitive statement on this subject by quoting the opening comments made by the chairman of our committee this morning, perhaps I could be allowed to say that I think the chairman in his remarks accurately described the position taken by members of the committee in this respect.

• (1510)

Honourable senators, speaking for myself and I am sure for some others, I want to make the point that we should confirm the suggestion of the chairman of the committee that the ambassador for Israel should receive a special invitation to appear before this committee should he deem it desirable to do so.

I agree that we have had the most extensive discussions, as has been said, at high levels in the State of Israel itself, which I myself found to be illuminating and helpful, but, if the ambassador of that country deems it in his interest to appear before us, I would be glad to welcome him.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE BUDGETS TABLED

Hon. Ernest G. Côtteau for Senator McElman, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled reports approving supplementary budgets of the following committees:

National Defence; Foreign Affairs; and Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

(For text of reports see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTIETH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, SEOUL, KOREA—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, April 12, 1984, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventieth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Seoul, Korea, from October 4 to 12, 1983, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada; as well as the delegation's visit to China and their meetings with the officials of that country.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

[Senator Hicks.]

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, April 10, 1984, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

MR. GEORGE R. BAKER, EDITOR OF DEBATES—FELICITATIONS ON COMPLETION OF 25 YEARS OF SERVICE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think this is as appropriate a time as any to inform you that one of our senior staff members, Mr. George R. Baker, Editor of Debates and Chief of the Reporting Branch, completed 25 years of employment in the Senate last Saturday, March 31.

As further evidence of his steadfast and loyal character—

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: He should stay another 25 years.

Senator Frith: I hope so—that day was also Mr. and Mrs. Baker's thirty-ninth wedding anniversary.

I am sure honourable senators would wish me to thank Mr. Baker for his service to the Senate, convey the view that we look forward to more of the same, and congratulate him on his wedding anniversary.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to join my honourable friend in his offer of congratulations. I would add a special word of appreciation for the stamina of Mr. Baker if he has listened to our debates for 25 years. That takes some doing. I hope we may be a little easier on him for the remainder of his tour of duty in this chamber.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am pleased to hear Question Period being called because, in looking over my scroll, I see that it was omitted.

On a point of order, I would like to say that it seems to me that in future, when we have third reading of a bill such as we had today, instead of the bill being read before Question Period is called, it should be given a preferred place after Question Period.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Especially when we anticipate some debate.

Senator Roblin: The reason for my view is obvious. Two of the ministers who sit in this chamber to answer questions are not present. They are refugees from the debate. I am a little—I would not say unhappy—disappointed that Senator Austin is not here to answer a few questions about his favourite topic, Canadair.

Senator Frith: I think we can ask him to return to the chamber.

Senator Roblin: That would be splendid. If Senator Argue were around, I would have one or two questions for him too.

Senator Frith: Are there any other questions in the meantime?

Senator Roblin: I have some, but I will spare you.

If there is a difficulty, rather than hold up the Senate, I am prepared to pose my questions on Tuesday next rather than delay our proceedings this afternoon.

I hope that, in future, we will order our business a little differently so that ministers will more likely be available.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the point raised by Senator Roblin is quite reasonable. We proceeded as we did because sometimes, if we are to have Royal Assent to a bill—particularly a money bill—if it, indeed, receives third reading, we like to know as early as possible what our program will be after the third reading. At third reading the debate is often short.

I expected Senator Murray to intervene on third reading and I should have, therefore, put it down further so that the ministers would have been here for Question Period.

The point is well taken, and I will take it into account in the future.

PROHIBITED DEGREES OF MARRIAGE BILL

SECOND READING

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-13, intituled: "An Act to consolidate and amend the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons".—(Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.)

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I think this is going to be the shortest speech of my career. I just heard a sigh of relief from my colleague, Senator Lapointe, who thinks, and she is probably not alone in doing so, that I speak too often.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Brevity is the soul of wit.

Senator Asselin: Exactly. I think Senator Lapointe is probably right as far as marriage exemptions are concerned. I have made about half a dozen speeches on the subject, in addition to our work in committee.

I read very carefully the comments made by the bill's sponsor, our honourable friend Senator Stanbury, who consulted me beforehand.

In committee, we agreed it was necessary to clarify the situation by introducing a bill to have these exemption cases included in the general law.

I am satisfied with the information provided by Senator Stanbury and he is to be congratulated. As for the principle, I have no objection, but I must nevertheless consider the comments of my colleague, Senator Donahoe, regarding the passage in principle of this bill.

I think it is time, as Senator Donahoe pointed out, to seek out and obtain the views of the Canadian churches on a problem that is both religious and social, and sometimes economic as well. I think the committee did well to invite representatives of the Canadian churches to appear before the committee. They were invited to give their views on a problem which, I feel, is a serious one for the churches in question.

In any event, I have no objection to having the bill referred to committee as soon as possible, so that we can receive these briefs and hear the witnesses, and subsequently have the bill passed as soon as possible in the Senate, so that the Minister of Justice can study the bill and have the legislation passed as soon as possible in the House of Commons.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Stanbury, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION ACT, 1979

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill S-12, to amend the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-12 is about some rather esoteric subjects, at least esoteric to some of us. The principal players in the drama are shipping conferences, groups of shippers and the laws respecting restraint of trade and monopolies. The shipping lines or conferences, as you probably know, are the lines of freight shippers around the world who have various routes that they service. One can compare those lines to the kind of maps you see in airline folders showing the places where the airline travels. The shipping lines, as you can imagine, are probably more complicated than the airline routes. The shipping conferences made up of these shipping lines have, for approximately 100 years, developed particular lines of service, namely, areas in which they virtually control the traffic. In the course of doing so, they deal with their customers who are the shippers. Any of us with even rudimentary knowledge and information about the laws regarding restraint of trade, combines and anti-competition actions would understand or realize that if such arrangements are made to the point of reducing or, to use the classic words in competition law, unduly limiting competition, they would infringe on such laws. That is the general background for Bill S-12.

The bill states "An Act to amend the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979." That act has its own background. In the Canadian trades, there are both conference and non-conference independent operators. I have given honourable senators the basic outline of what a conference is, but it is somewhat more complicated than that. I will only touch on these complications because for the purpose of understanding the bill it is not necessary to understand such additional arcane expressions as "closed" or "open" conferences or the differences between them.

One particular characteristic of conference activities is loyalty or patronage contracts. You will see them referred to in the bill, and that is why I should take a moment to explain that under those contracts, shippers are required to commit all or a portion of their goods for a specific period of time to conference members. In return for such a commitment, shippers receive up to a 15 per cent reduction in the rates filed with the Canadian Transport Commission with whom all conference rates must be filed.

Honourable senators, I mentioned that liner traffic is important to Canada. Commodities in the liner trades, in general, consist of higher valued finished and semi-finished products, and in 1978 amounted to approximately $20 billion compared to a total deep-sea trade of $29.8 billion. Therefore, on the basis of value, the Canadian liner trades account for 67 per cent of Canada's total deep-sea trade.

On the subject of competition, I have already mentioned that such arrangements are anti-competitive and therefore infringe on restraint of trade legislation. Some competition exists on most trade routes serving Canadian needs as the option of shipping through U.S. ports is a feasible one for most Canadian shippers. In addition, competition for Canadian cargoes exists between conference members.

As I mentioned, shipping conferences have been in existence for more than 100 years. As of December 31, 1982, there were 48 inbound and outbound conferences active in the Canadian trades. There have been several government investigations into conference practices starting as early as 1912. In 1965, after a comprehensive study on conference practices, the Canadian Restrictive Trade Practices Commission concluded that conferences operated as cartels, as we have already suspected, contrary to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, but that the public interest would not be served by excessive rate competition and instability in the liner trades. As a result,

[Senator Frith.]

Parliament enacted the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, which came into force on April 1, 1971. That act expired on March 31, 1979, and was replaced by the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979, which is the act referred to in the title of Bill S-12. The 1979 act would have expired on March 31, 1984, but it has been extended for one year by proclamation and will now expire on March 31, 1985.

To put it into context, we now have the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979. I think we all understand what the word "exemption" means, namely, exempting it from certain provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. That act is now continued for another year while we look at this bill which is going to accomplish the objectives I will now mention.

In approving the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979, cabinet at that time directed that the Department of Transport, along with other interested departments, report on the advantages and disadvantages of continuing to exempt conferences from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. I remind you that the original exemption was based upon the decision that there was an advantage to the public interest in not allowing extensive and complete competition to exist in this area. In meeting that requirement, the Canadian Transport Commission held public hearings in five centres across Canada in June of 1982. The findings of the commission are contained in a report to the Minister of Transport, and there is also this discussion paper that honourable senators can have if they find it of interest. Five studies by independent consultants were also commissioned, including one which specifically surveyed shippers—one of the other parties to the drama—the other important party to the drama being the liners on one side and the shippers on the other. These reports were distributed to interested industry groups who provided comments.

Three basic alternatives presented themselves with respect to the existing act. First, allow the act to expire, and that would mean that the conferences, of course, would then be subject to the full force of the Combines Investigation Act.

● (1530)

A second possibility was to extend the act without modification, to extend it as it stood in its 1979 form.

A third possibility was to amend the act to include a number of amendments identified by the studies and submissions I have just mentioned.

The decision was to take the third alternative, namely, to amend the act to include a number of amendments as identified by the various studies.

The present act spells out those conference practices, such as the charging of a common tariff, that are exempted from the Combines Investigation Act. At the same time it lists those practices, such as rebating, where a patronage contract applies—we explained that a moment ago—that are not exempted; in other words, that are subject to the force of the combines law.

The following are some of the changes that are incorporated in the bill before us: The act requires conferences—that is, the liner groups—to file with the Canadian Transport Commission all relevant documents, such as agreements and tariffs, and specifies the penalties if the provisions of the act are not adhered to. The basic approach has been to permit conferences to operate freely in Canadian trades, but subject to certain requirements designed to protect the public interest.

In setting out clearly those conference practices that are acceptable and those that are not, conferences are given guidelines which allow them to operate in the assurance that they will not lose their exempt status from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act so long as they operate on the basis of the rules. So, in effect, we have a sort of regulated activity that permits exemption from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, provided that the activity falls within those regulatory boundaries. At the same time, however, it has become clear that a number of changes would be desirable to ensure that the national interest is fully served.

So the amendments contained in Bill S-12 have three broad objectives: First, to encourage meaningful consultations between conferences and shippers. That is very important, because, of course, the shippers are particularly affected by these exemptions, and, as a result, the public. The second objective is to encourage commercial resolution of problems between conferences and shippers to the greatest extent possible. The third objective is to clarify certain areas of the act affecting competition and the protection of the public interest.

I will touch briefly on those three objectives. About the first one, to encourage meaningful consultations, the designated group will be required to submit annual reports to the Canadian Transport Commission on their operations and activities under the act, and their concerns and views on their conference operations. Conferences will be required to give 90 days' notice of proposed freight rate increases to the Canadian Transport Commission and the designated shippers' group.

Consultations must be held on matters of common interest where requested in writing by either party, and both parties must provide information relevant to those matters. So where there are matters of common interest, the two groups—the conferences and the designated shippers' group—must get together to confer and provide the information to the CTC.

The second objective, of encouraging commercial resolutions to problems, rather than government intervention, is an extension of the first. Where problems arise, either the conferences or the designated shippers' group may request the CTC to take on a role as observer during consultations. Where these procedures fail, either party can submit unresolved matters between them to conciliation.

The third objective has to do with clarifying certain provisions of the existing act with respect to competition and the protection of the public interest. The present exemption for contracts, agreements or arrangements between members of a conference and independents will be removed, making them subject to the Combines Investigation Act. The CTC will be authorized to suspend or lift the exemption. So although the exemption exists, there is this flexibility that does not make it an absolute copper fastened exemption, because the CTC will be authorized to lift the exemption provided in the act where appropriate after holding a public hearing in accordance with section 23 of the National Transportation Act. Incidentally, those hearings can be initiated by interested persons. Failing to negotiate in good faith will be considered to be against the public interest when applying section 23.

The concept has been introduced whereby that exemption will not apply if predatory behaviour is engaged in by any member of the conference. The word "predatory" has the same meaning as one would expect, namely, when members of a combine, in effect, deliberately gang up to destroy one source of competition or someone else in the industry.

The right of independent action for individual members of conferences is established under certain conditions. There are minor clarifications with respect to commencement of the exemption period and the meaning of patronage contracts.

The present fines and deposits in the punishments and security provisions are unrealistically low, and therefore appropriate changes have been made in the bill. The time limitation for the commencement of prosecution for an offence has been extended from one year to three years. That increases again the vulnerability of the conferences to prosecution for undesirable behaviour.

While a number of countries, including Canada, carry out periodic reviews of the activities of shipping conferences, most countries continue to support the liner conference concept.

Honourable senators, I believe that the bill amends the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979, in such a way as to provide an appropriate balance between the needs of shippers and those of conference members. Honourable senators will recall that that was the third alternative, not merely to extend the act but to amend it. The bill will provide adequate safeguards to protect the public interest and the necessary framework to permit the conference members to provide a measure of rate and service stability in this volatile world of ocean shipping. For those reasons I ask honourable senators to support the bill on second reading.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, in order to avoid upsetting Senator Lapointe by my speaking a second time, I will resist the temptation to reply to Senator Frith's speech today and will therefore move adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN YOUTH

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hébert, seconded by the Honourable Senator Le Moyné:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Canadian youth between 15 and 24 years of age;

That the Committee be composed of 12 Senators to be designated at a later date;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than March 1, 1985, and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That the motion be amended in the first paragraph by

1) deleting the words "a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed" and substituting therefor the following words: "the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized", and

2) deleting all remaining paragraphs.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, although, like everyone else in this house, when I speak I do so for myself, I should inform the Senate that I have the permission of Senator Macdonald to say that he much regrets the indication given by the leader of the house that this amendment will not be supported but that the leader recommends that a special committee be appointed for this purpose.

I wish to make it quite clear that I listened with much sympathy and interest to the presentation made by Senator Hébert on this topic, and I do not believe there is any disagreement between honourable senators with regard to the importance of the subject to which he makes reference, or the desirability of having the Senate take an interest in it—because undoubtedly the question of the serious problems faced by young men and women between the ages of 15 and 24 is a most important public question that we could be debating, studying or reflecting upon. So I am pleased that Senator Hébert has brought this matter to our attention and has made a positive recommendation.

I am not quarreling with the substance of the motion. I merely draw attention to the difficulties that will be involved in the procedure that will be followed in dealing with this important public issue. The original proposal, as everybody knows, was that there should be a special Senate committee formed. The amendment proposes that the matter should be referred to the committee that we already have, whose mandate includes youth affairs. I am really disappointed in the sense that there is not more support for that amendment in the chamber.

When speaking on the subject, the Deputy Leader of the Government gave a number of reasons as to why he did not like the amendment and as to why he decided that the special committee would be the way to go. The main reason that stuck in my memory is that if the matter went before the present committee it would involve setting up a subcommittee of that body which, in turn, would require the attention of more senators than would otherwise be the case. Honourable senators, I do not really follow the logic of that. Perhaps a subcommittee would be set up. Such a committee was set up in connection with the Goldenberg-Lamontagne study on the future of the Senate. I never understood why there was a subcommittee set up at that time. It did not seem to me that it was absolutely necessary to do so, although I had no objection to it.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Nor did they pay much attention to it.

Senator Roblin: Nobody paid much attention to that report, perfectly true, and I hope that the study on youth gets a little more active consideration than did that topic. I am sure that it will.

As far as that goes, honourable senators, I do not see why what happened in a previous committee on another subject has any real bearing on this one, because I would have thought that there is absolutely no reason why the present committee on youth should not be seized of this matter as a full committee. Certainly that would be justified and the subject could be dealt with as a priority item, among the other items of business before that committee. I think we must recognize that, to deal with the matter properly, the present committee which is responsible for youth affairs would have to accept this reference as a priority item. I am sure there would be no problem in its doing so. In the event, however, that honourable senators did want to have a subcommittee, it could certainly be struck from the present members of the committee.

Why am I concerned about this? I am concerned because we want to do our share—and when I say "we" I am talking about the members of the opposition. We are interested in this topic. We want to do our share and we want the procedure to be such that we have the maximum opportunity to make whatever contribution we can to this pressing public issue. That leads me to refer to the paucity of numbers—"paucity," which means few—in the opposition here and to the difficulty we have in manning these committees.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): In number, not in quality.

Senator Roblin: I will not speak to quality, but any recommendation made in that respect will be appreciated.

Honourable senators, I want to talk about the 11 committees we have now. There are now 11 active committees—three or four more are not very active but require some attention—and we are being asked to add another to make a total of 12. There is another motion before the chamber which calls for the setting up of yet another committee having to do with the native peoples of Canada. In terms of merit, there is no argument that that is a subject that also requires our attention. But we could go on in this way indefinitely, finding items of merit that would justify, if viewed in isolation, the establishment of a special committee of the Senate but which, if pursued in the way that we seem to be going now, would give us so many committees that we on this side of the house would have one heck of a time doing justice to the subjects before us. We would be able to make a better contribution, I am convinced, if we referred these matters to the standing committees we have now, which we are able to man to some extent, at any rate.

There is another problem, too. If we add to the number of committees, when are they going to meet? At 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon three committees met, requiring the attendance of 12 members of the opposition. That is practically the whole of our active body at this particular time. If two more committees are formed, when will they meet? Will they be added on to the meetings conducted Wednesday afternoons or Thursday mornings? The number of committees, the proliferation of subjects and the state of the numerical roll of the opposition are on a collision course and we want some consideration of this problem of ours.

I appeal to the Deputy Leader of the Government to take this matter under advisement once again. I will not be upset if he decides to change his mind. In fact, consistency is the virtue of small minds. My friend has no small mind, so he need not be consistent. I will allow him the privilege of inconsistency. I enjoy it myself sometimes, so I do not begrudge it to him. I would ask him, however, to please consider this matter. We want to do our part. Our numbers are few. If the number of committees is increased and we are spread even thinner, not only will it clog up our regular agenda but it will prevent us from doing the job we were sent here to do and that which we want to do.

Honourable senators, these are important topics. In my opinion they can be dealt with through the committee system that we now have. We would then be able to do our part better than might otherwise be the case. This is a difficult question. There is merit in the proposal, beyond doubt, but, in terms of practicalities and getting on with the job, I hope that this amendment can receive further consideration.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, although I cannot speak again on the amendment, I will say something on the motion. I had understood that the matter would be put this afternoon, after having spoken to Senator Flynn, Senator Macdonald and Senator Marshall about it. I am not at all unsympathetic to the views expressed by Senator Roblin, and I have already proved that I am capable of inconsistency because my first reaction to Senator Marshall's amendment was to support it. Taking all of these things into account, however, I simply have to make the judgment that I think is best.

Senator Roblin: Should this not wait until we have disposed of the amendment?

Senator Frith: Yes, it should. I merely wanted to express my sympathy for your point of view.

Senator Roblin: You will have another opportunity to express it in full.

Senator Frith: I spoke to Senator Flynn. I understood that we would put the amendment today and have it on division, of course.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I would prefer to adjourn the debate on the amendment at this time. By next week, Senator Frith, some arrangement could be made between the two groups. We will try to work it out.

Senator Frith: I should say, honourable senators, on the motion to adjourn the debate—

Senator Roblin: Do not speak on that; speak on a point of order. You cannot debate the motion.

Senator Frith: No, I would not. On the question of adjournment—and I would not think of refusing the adjournment if Senator Asselin or anyone else wishes to speak to the amendment—I can only say that this is not an on-the-spot decision. I have discussed the matter with Senator Olson, Senator Marshall, Senator Flynn, Senator Macdonald and Senator Petten. I just want to assure honourable senators that discussion has been going on and that I have thought about the delicate balance. It balances one way in my opinion and the other way in Senator Roblin's opinion. That is why I wanted to have the matter disposed of this week so that the committee could begin.

The main committee, as honourable senators know, has a lot on its plate. It has before it Bill C-3, and all of these veterans estimates that have been referred to it. If honourable senators are going to undertake this study—and we all seem to agree that we want to—I would like to see the clock start to tick to enable the committee to do all of the preparatory things before the study can be commenced.

Senator Asselin: I do not want to deprive anybody of speaking to the motion, but I would like to have a few more days in order to think about it. Yesterday I met with the Minister of Youth of the other place. We had a discussion about the motion of Senator Hébert on the forming of a special committee. Perhaps at the beginning of next week I will have some views to express to the Senate. If I could have the chance to express them in due course, I would appreciate it very much.

Senator Frith: That is understood, honourable senators. I hope that we can vote on the motion next week and dispose of it one way or the other.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

THE BUDGET SPEECH

PROPOSALS BY MINISTER OF FINANCE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith calling the attention of the Senate to the proposals contained in the Budget Speech made by the Minister of Finance in the other place on 15th February, 1984.—(Honourable Senator Côtteau).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would ask that order No. 4 be adjourned in the name of Senator Anderson. I believe that Senator Côtteau does not wish to speak to it, while Senator Anderson does and plans to do so next week. I should also mention that that will be the eighth day of debate on the matter and will discharge that order.

Order stands.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MOTION TO ESTABLISH STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of April 3, 1984, moved:

That Rule 67(1) of the Rules of the Senate be amended by relettering paragraphs (e) to (n) inclusive as paragraphs (f) to (o) inclusive and inserting immediately after paragraph (d), the following as new paragraph (e):

“(e) The Joint Committee on Official Languages policy and programs, to which shall be appointed nine senators.”;

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate agrees to unite with that House in the establishment of a Joint Committee of both Houses on Official Languages policy and programs; and

That the Senate will appoint nine of its members, to be designated at a later date, to serve on the said Joint Committee.

He said: Honourable senators, this motion is for the purpose of expressing our concurrence in the formation of a standing committee. As honourable senators will recall, we have had a Special Committee on Official Languages now for some years. The other place has requested the establishment of a standing joint committee and has asked us to concur in that motion.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not entirely sure that I recall the explanation that my honourable friend says he gave. By this motion, is he merely altering the number of senators, or is there something more involved in that?

Senator Frith: No, it does more than that. It establishes a standing joint committee where previously there existed only a special committee. It also sets the number of senators at nine. I did previously discuss the question of numbers with Senator Macdonald and Senator Petten.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to add, with respect to this motion, that I was a member of the joint committee. The purpose of the motion is to form a standing committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. I would have liked cabinet to accept other suggestions that were submitted in our report, especially the one to give more power to the Commissioner of Official Languages, and also the suggestion that we discuss the precedence of the Official Languages Act over all other government legislation.

Senator Frith: It is in the Constitution.

Senator Asselin: In any case, we had a good discussion on the subject in committee. We would have liked the government to be able to take a stand on these issues.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: The number of senators is now set at nine. Could Senator Frith inform the Senate how many there were before on the special committee?

Senator Frith: That is a good question. I think there were seven. I am sorry I do not know the exact number. Now I am told there were six. Since it is clearly a non-partisan matter of principle, and the motion is supported by both parties in this chamber, perhaps, with leave of Senator Bosa, we could add Senator Asselin's name as co-mover.

Senator Asselin: That will enhance your motion.

Motion agreed to.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES OF CANADA

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Charlie Watt, pursuant to notice of March 27, 1984, moved:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Aboriginal Peoples of Canada;

That the Committee be composed of eight Senators;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required by the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, I am honoured to address this body. While this may be the first time I have spoken in this chamber, I can assure you that it will not be the last. As an aboriginal person and a new senator, I plan to participate fully in Senate deliberations and the important contribution that the Senate will make to the future of our country.

The motion I am presenting today concerns such a contribution. The motion calls for the establishment of a Special Senate Committee on Aboriginal Issues. Honourable senators, I believe that such a committee would have an especially important role to play at this point in time. It would provide all of us with a new forum on aboriginal issues, and I stress the word "new". It would provide all aboriginal peoples of Canada with a new forum in which to express their concerns. It would be a forum to develop new approaches, new ideas and new concepts. It would be a new method by which the Senate could address the needs of the aboriginal peoples.

Speaking from my personal experience, honourable senators, I know that the aboriginal peoples must be a part of this country, and that is one of our goals. However, Canada must provide us with a way to succeed in feeling and being a part of this country. Such things as special programs, bilateral negotiations, constitutional reforms and the land claims process all have their place in answering the concerns of the aboriginal peoples. These, however, are not enough because impasse at these forums is unavoidable. I think honourable senators saw an example of this only too clearly a few short weeks ago at the First Ministers' Conference on Aboriginal Rights. I am saying that, when the system stalls or fails, we owe it to the aboriginal peoples and to the entire country to find new ways of dealing with these important issues.

I believe that the Senate must make a meaningful commitment to the aboriginal peoples. The Senate is in a unique position to take a long-term approach on those issues. Most of all, however, the Senate must play a more active role under its special trusteeship responsibility for the aboriginal peoples of this country. This responsibility belongs to the Senate as much as it belongs to any other federal institution.

• (1600)

In order to be effective, the proposed Senate committee will have to deal with a wide range of issues. In addition to social and cultural matters, I would see the committee devoting a good deal of time and effort to questions relating to the political and economic development of the aboriginal peoples. Moreover, it would have to examine the day to day implementation problems at the local level so that the opportunity to develop new approaches and new thinking is not poisoned.

Honourable senators, I believe that such a committee could quickly be put to work exploring such questions as workable models of self-government for aboriginal peoples. Many people in this country do not have a clear understanding of what self-government is all about. One senator from Alberta came to me the other day and said that he did not know what self-government was all about. I can provide that information, as can many of my people. It is just a matter of sitting down and exchanging views and trying to understand the crux of the issue. That is what I believe the Senate can contribute to, and not only contribute to it by way of the establishment of institutions but by passing on information to the general public of Canada. I think we owe that to the general public of Canada. I think that is important if the two nations of this country are to survive. The method of self-government and the mechanisms have to be worked out. I believe that that should be the responsibility of the proposed committee.

We intend to remain in this country, and the problem is not going to disappear. No matter how the system might ignore the needs and cries of our people, the problem will never disappear. Since it will always be here, it is better to try to deal with it now. I have pressured the government, regardless of what government was in power, and have been doing so for the past 15 years.

Some honourable senators might think that I am too close to the problem. That may be so, but I believe that I am also close to the solution. I believe I can contribute to the work of that committee if and when it is struck.

An additional problem arose out of the James Bay/Quebec agreement, to give you an example—a problem which we did not foresee at the time we negotiated and at the time leading up to the convention—and that is the problem of individual versus collective rights under aboriginal self-government. Why is there a problem in that area? It is because there are so many fragmented institutions that cannot get together or work together because the law does not allow them to. That is one reason why the aboriginal peoples have determined to establish self-government, because when there are two sets of institutions in place, one being an ethnic body and one being a public body, there are problems when one gets to individual versus collective rights. That has to be ironed out. If the James Bay/Quebec agreement is to be used as a model right across the country, there will be problems. Before those problems get too big, I think we should deal with them.

Additional areas I feel should be examined by the proposed Senate committee are alternatives to the current extinguishment policy and land claims approach. Again, if I were to try to outline to you what those alternatives mean, you would only be hearing my side of the story, but I should like to have this proposed committee in place so it can enjoy the same understanding I have as to the current extinguishment policy. There are alternatives.

Perhaps some might ask why we need land claims settlements. Well, if there are no land claims settlements, how does one deal with land claims.

Finally, honourable senators, I am aware that the creation of new committees may well burden the Progressive Conservative members of the Senate with still more duties. However, I would like to state that the proposed committee would be small, and I would also stress the non-partisan nature of the issues it would be dealing with. I believe the Progressive Conservative Party has one or two senators they could name to this committee, but that will be up to them. I know we can put together a committee to study aboriginal issues.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Senator Frith will fix that.

Senator Watt: I appreciate that.

In closing, honourable senators, I call upon you to give unanimous consent to my motion to establish a Special Committee of the Senate on Aboriginal Issues.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS LIMITED—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-10, to amend the act of incorporation of United Grain Growers Limited, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to provide borrowing authority (Bill C-21 Chapter No. 5)

An Act to amend the Act of incorporation of United Grain Growers Limited (Bill S-10)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 10, 1984, at 8 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 420)

UnclassifiedDepartment of Finance
April 5, 1984NOTES ON THE BUDGET FORECAST FOR PUBLIC DEBT CHARGES

The February 1984 budget and the Main Estimates for fiscal year 1984-85 contain the following estimates for public debt charges:

	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Public Debt Charges
— $ millions	16,971	18,130	20,350
— % of total outlays	21.3	20.0	20.7
— % of budgetary revenues	30.8	30.9	30.2
— % of GNP	4.8	4.7	4.7

The figures for 1982-83 are final audited numbers as reported in the public accounts. The figures for 1983-84 are estimates based on the experience up to the time the budget was presented in February 1984 and on the forecast for the remainder of the fiscal year. The figures for 1984-85 are forecasts based on the assumptions outlined in the budget.

The forecast for public debt charges in 1984-85 is based on a detailed accounting of outstanding debt and projected new issues of debt. Each outstanding debt issue is tracked and the debt charges associated with it are computed. In addition, assumptions are made concerning

- (1) total new debt issues (based on the budget forecast for financial requirements)
- (2) the debt market strategy to be adopted (which involves assumptions about when the debt will be issued and the proportion of the debt that will be covered by each of the available debt instruments) and
- (3) the interest rates that will apply to new debt issues as they are sold.

The results of this detailed calculation are added up and the result is presented in the budget as the government's forecast for total public debt charges.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, April 10, 1984

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

CANADA HEALTH BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-3, relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services provided under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You should have asked for leave, because normally the bill would be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday. The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, as I understand it, will present a report on the subject matter of this bill tomorrow. That is why I think we should wait, at least until tomorrow.

Senator Olson: I agree. As usual, Senator Flynn has been very helpful.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He is always right.

Senator Olson: He is usually right, and that is as far as I will go this evening.

Senator Flynn: I am always right, but the Senate does not give me a right.

Senator Olson: If I may, I should like to thank Senator Flynn for his interjection and agree with it because it does lay out more precisely what I think was the understanding.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE REFORM

RESPONSE OF GOVERNMENT TO REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

On Presentation of Petitions:

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the response of the Government of Canada to the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform which was tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, January 31, 1984. This is Sessional Paper 322-155.

I ask that this response of the Government of Canada be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of document see appendix, p. 452.)

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE-CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, April 17, 1984, I will move:

That whereas the fundamental purpose of the Constitution of Canada is to protect the basic rights of all Canadians;

Whereas certain basic rights of Canadians of Japanese descent were infringed upon by acts taken by the Government of Canada and others by reason only of their racial origin and not their loyalty to Canada;

Whereas there are living Canadians of Japanese descent who suffered and who continue to suffer as a result of these unconscionable acts taken falsely in the name of patriotism or security;

(1) the Senate of Canada endorses, on behalf of all Canadians, the position that a formal apology be extended by the Government of Canada to those living Canadians of Japanese descent for the acts of incarceration of such individuals and the confiscation of their businesses and properties made during the Second World War;

(2) the Government should consider the advisability of appointing a Special Claims Commissioner to adjudicate partial compensation for claims made by living Canadians of Japanese descent for the loss of their businesses or properties as a result thereof; and

(a) that such claims for partial compensation be received by the Claims Commissioner for a period of one year from the date of proclamation of the Act establishing the same;

(b) that $50 million be allocated by the Government in the aggregate for all such claims;

(c) that the balance of any such $50 million be returned to the Government when the Commission completes its responsibilities; and

(3) the Government take the necessary steps to ensure that any personal records or fingerprints, if any, of Canadians of Japanese descent obtained and kept by police officials during the Second World War be destroyed forthwith.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, quite distinct from the substance of Senator Grafstein's motion, it does have a preamble which, technically, is out of order under rule 22. Perhaps before the motion is moved on Tuesday, Your Honour would look to see whether the mover might be prepared to leave out the preamble. I am not making objection to what is said in the preamble, but it ought not to be in the motion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps it would shorten the speech of the honourable senator.

Senator Frith: That is a possible merit of a preamble.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED

FINANCIAL STATUS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask some questions of Senator Austin. The topic around which my questions are framed this evening has to do with de Havilland.

As honourable senators know, sometime last month we were recommended by the minister to supply the amount of $240 million as an advance to that company in order to cover certain financial requirements. At the time that the advance was proposed—certainly in the committee and, I think, in the house—the minister declined to give us any statement to justify the expenditure of this sum of money or to report to the chamber on the status of de Havilland's activities at the present time. Since then, the matter has been raised in a wider forum, and I wonder if the minister is prepared now to tell us something about the situation that he sees facing that company.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Thank you, Senator Roblin. I am not surprised that I am being questioned this evening about de Havilland, and I appreciate your invitation to make a statement. I hope that my colleagues will allow me to speak somewhat fully to the question.

When we included in the supplementary estimates, which were voted as at March 31, the sum of $240 million for de Havilland, the amount was inserted as a requirement to assist in the repayment of existing debt. In fact, the debt was in the area of $323 million, against which the $240 million has been a contribution. We were able to pay the debt off in full because sales activities by de Havilland have risen quite effectively in the last two quarters. We sold out our inventory of Dash-7s and we are considering recommencing that production line.

There have been other revenue sources as well, so that, at the moment, de Havilland is not in debt, aside from its ordinary trade liabilities.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Without deficit?

Senator Austin: Without deficit?

Senator Asselin: I thought you called it a deficit.

Senator Austin: de Havilland has no corporate debt except its normal current trade liabilities, Senator Asselin.

The decision that was before the government and that was referred to the CDIC in the late fall of 1982, when I became responsible for the CDIC and de Havilland, was whether to enter production of the Dash-8. Unlike the situation in Canada, where the decision to produce the Challenger had been made—and we were now reaping the results of overruns of cost—the Dash-8 decision had not been made. Therefore, I had the responsibility for recommending to my colleagues in the cabinet what to do about production of the Dash-8.

This process has been continuing through government evaluation and consideration. The short of it is that the management and board of directors of the CDIC as well as de Havilland came to the conclusion that, on the basis of commercial sales potential, the production of the Dash-8 was not a commercial decision which they could take.

As honourable senators know, de Havilland has an excellent reputation. In fact, that reputation continues to be merited for its production of aircraft in its class: the Dash-7, the Otter, the Buffalo, and, of course, the great Beaver. The Dash-8 is ranked by the technical community as a great success in the 35-passenger class. We believe that it will, as all other de Havilland products have done, take the largest share of the market for this type of aircraft. We have assessed that market in great detail and have taken a great deal of advice from professionals about it. It is a hotly competitive market, and we face, in this class, five other aircraft seeking to establish themselves. Of those five other aircraft, all have state support. Some are entirely state-supported while some are mainly state-supported.

It is therefore impossible for us to know what the cost-effectiveness of our product is as against theirs, but, in testing the market, our price is competitive. We have one concern, and that is that financing practices in this area of the aircraft industry—as in most areas of the aircraft industry—can only be described as predatory. There is enormous activity in the form of interest buy-down. There is enormous activity in the way of assumption by the aircraft manufacturers of various financing costs, so that there is some additional level of subsidy.

Notwithstanding all of that, it has been noted by cabinet that a commercial level of performance can result if we achieve a somewhat more optimistic experience than that predicted by the CDIC and de Havilland. In consequence of that, I presented to cabinet, and I intended to present to Parliament this coming Friday, April 13, the financial statements of de Havilland and to follow with an explanation that the federal government had determined that it would proceed with the Dash-8 production.

Let me tell honourable senators that the consequence of adopting the conservative financing case which we have accepted on the recommendation of CDIC and based on a 10-year de Havilland Dash-8 production cycle is, in our estimate, a likely cost to the taxpayers of approximately $200 million over that 10-year period.

The government believes that the decision to proceed with the Dash-8, although not commercially justified, is justified on a national policy basis. de Havilland is a highly significant manufacturer in Canada. It is important in the Province of Ontario, and I might add that I have spoken to the appropriate minister of the Government of Ontario, and that government has been encouraging concerning our decision to proceed on the basis I have mentioned. The company is significant to our aerospace effort. It employs approximately 4,000 people directly and an additional 4,000 to 5,000 people indirectly in manufacturing enterprises, small businesses, all across Canada. Much of the parts for de Havilland aircraft are manufactured in components in the private sector. The aircraft is also 72 per cent Canadian. It is an important user of the Pratt & Whitney engine which has been developed by that company in its premises in Montreal, and which promises to be one of the most successful engines developed in Canada.

It was our conclusion that in order to protect our technology and our ability to remain in the aerospace industry, we should make this investment. We have no intention of creating a static position for de Havilland as a corporation. We have a good deal of work to do to ensure its future. We have down-sized the company, to use the jargon, to make it as lean as possible while still being able to do this work. We have studied the integration of some of its activities with Canadair in order to save some additional funds, and we shall continue to monitor and control its costs.

The company, from all of our business case studies, would, in fact, be in a comfortable financial situation commercially, and we will take no losses on the Dash-8 if, from every sector of business, we could generate an additional $150 million annually of cash to the company. Therefore, one of the objectives of proceeding is in order to find these new business sectors to enhance the company's efficiency, and to turn de Havilland around in the shortest possible order.

I believe that the decision is a sound one in policy. In the finance committee of the other place, I offered to bring the analysis to members of that committee and to discuss the options with them, so that, to the extent possible, we could have a non-partisan decision in this particularly important manufacturing industry. However, Michael Wilson, the Conservative member in the other place, said he wanted the government to take the responsibility for a decision and to bring a decision to Parliament. That, indeed, is what we have done.

As I said, I wanted to bring this report to Parliament on Friday, when I will be able to table the de Havilland financial statements.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On Friday?

Senator Austin: On Friday, in the other place. My intention was to table the financial statement and make a statement available next Friday. However, today's Globe and Mail carried a story based on an assessment report by the Ministry of State for Economic and Regional Development. As a result, I responded to the press this afternoon, as the Prime Minister said during Question Period in the other place I would do, and to this chamber this evening. Of course, I am prepared to answer further questions as honourable senators present them.

Senator Asselin: You have not answered any questions; you have made a statement. Can I get a copy of the statement?

Senator Austin: You will have one.

Senator Asselin: When, next week?

Senator Roblin: I expected the minister to make a statement on this subject tonight and that is why I phrased my original question in such a way as to enable him to do so.

Senator Austin: Thank you.

Senator Roblin: However, I expected that he would supplement his verbal statement with a written one, because it is a little difficult for members on this side of the house to listen to a verbal statement and to grasp the full implications of what is being said. There are one or two things that stand out. The statement the minister gave us does not seem to square very well with the information that was given in the press report to which he has alluded with respect to the analysis made by the Ministry of State for Economic Development on February 2. Their statement of that date, which, I trust, is correctly quoted in the newspaper, reads as follows:

The management and board of directors of the CDIC—That is the first point, the CDIC.

—have concluded that the Dash-8 program, and, therefore de Havilland, will not become commercially viable within a 10-year time horizon on the basis of current financial arrangements, . . .

Indeed, under conservative but realistic sales forecasts the company is not expected to achieve a break-even position on cash requirements within the period.

One of the key phrases in that statement which the minister might be prepared to expand upon is the reference to the "basis of current financial arrangements." We know very well that when the matter of Canadair was before this house a solution was found to the problem of current financial arrangements by that famous sleight-of-hand transfer of $1.350 billion from the books of Canadair to a company which I shall refer to as "old Canadair." It is easy to see that if you make the right financial arrangements you can get any kind of result you want with respect to the future prospects of the particular company. I would like to know from the minister whether any changes are contemplated in the financial arrangements with respect to de Havilland which would enable him to say that in the opinion of the government the continued operation of this company is in the public interest.

Speaking for myself, I shall leave that point open and not make any allegations tonight as to whether the continuation of de Havilland is good or bad. So far I do not think we have been given enough information or facts in this matter to make a suitable judgment but I do say to the minister that he has probably raised more questions than he has answered in his statement tonight. For example, he talked of a sum of $240 million as being the contribution of the public to the future success of de Havilland. I wonder how he arrives at that sum.

Since the fall of 1982, according to this statement, some $500 million of public funds have gone into the Canadair and, in addition, a guarantee has been given for some $450 million. What relation that situation has to the equity infusion of $240 million last month is a bit obscure to me. Perhaps it could be explained. The statement of February 2 that was prepared by the Ministry of State for Economic Development does say something about the future financial arrangements to be considered for this company. I am not sure from the minister's statement as to what the reaction of the government has been to that proposal because it proposes that the sum of $949 million be made available for the use of de Havilland in one way or another over the period 1984 to 1988.

If that figure is correct then I wonder how it affects the commercial viability of this company. If the minister is concerned about public sector support, and he seems to indicate that he is, then $949 million is a great deal of money. If you add into that figure what has already gone into this company it then becomes a colossal sum of money.

In the statement referred to, the breakdown of that $949 million is given. It is divided into about five or six categories. I suppose it is a little too much to expect the minister to expand on those categories tonight. Thus, I say to him, while I think his statement is useful in starting a discussion on this matter, I hope he will offer to make plain to the members of this house exactly what the financial complications of de Havilland are at the present time. The minister might even be prepared to do it before Friday, April 13. I can suggest a much better date; Wednesday, April 11 would be fine. I do not think it would break any of the rules of Parliament if he were to disclose to his colleagues in this house, or one of its committees, what he has in mind with respect to this company.

At that time he might say whether he has any plans with respect to a reorganization of de Havilland and Canadair by a form of joint operation, or matters of that sort, which he has undoubtedly considered.

The minister can see that there is a whole range of questions which are raised by his original statement and which require answers. I think my honourable friend would be well advised if he were to give us the complete justification for the policy the government is following. We understand very well the advantages of anything we can do to promote high technology industries, even if we have some airplanes which fly to South America and do not fly back again which are on the leading edge of technology, as the minister is so fond of telling us with respect to Challenger. Maybe the Dash-8 would be able to get there and come back as well—who knows? It is an interesting speculation.

I am saying to the minister we are familiar with the arguments made from time to time in order to justify an expenditure of public funds in a non-economic venture which this may turn out to be. By no means do we dismiss them. However, we think there is a point of balance. We think there is a benefit cost relationship. I am saying to the minister that we expect him to justify the benefit cost relationship of these expenditures of public funds if, indeed, the government goes ahead with them.

I invite my honourable friend to tell this chamber that he will attend a meeting of the National Finance Committee at his earliest convenience—Wednesday or Thursday—and let us in on the whole of this plan which the government has.

Senator Austin: Senator Roblin, in view of earlier remarks made by your colleagues, I thank you very much for making a statement even longer than my opening one. I will not go on at length.

Senator Roblin: If the questions are longer than the answers then there must be something wrong with the answers.

Senator Austin: You have raised very important questions. I would be pleased to meet with the National Finance Committee next week. The reason I say next week is because I believe honourable senators should have the advantage of having de Havilland's financial statements before I meet with the committee. Those financial statements will be made available in the other place on Friday, April 13, and in this chamber when it sits at the first opportunity next week. I would then be prepared to arrange a time next week to meet with the National Finance Committee in order to make a statement and endeavour to reply to the questions raised.

With respect to the subject of the Canadair Challenger, I would like to say that the problem with Mr. MacEachen's jet and his rapid descent to a lower altitude was in fact due to a very small valve in the oxygen system. The Challenger is a super-sophisticated technological product of the 1980s but it has a small valve in the oxygen system which failed to work. This valve was designed by someone else and placed in the aircraft by someone else. There are two alternative systems in the aircraft. It so happens that the design has both oxygen systems running through this one valve. Our specifications will probably be changed in that respect.

With respect to the questions concerning de Havilland, I could be prepared to do so. However, I would have to be allowed some 15 or 20 minutes in order to meet the questions asked. I am at the disposal of honourable senators. As an alternative, I am prepared to meet with the National Finance Committee next week.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I do appreciate the fact that the Minister of State for Social Development is offering to appear before the Committee on National Finance. However, I believe that the last time the Minister appeared before the committee, we asked for an in camera meeting. It is all very well to table Canadair's or de Havilland's financial statements, but actually they tell us absolutely nothing.

Any effort to scrutinize the companies' financial statements is wasted in sheer futility. I understand that the answers we try to obtain must be kept confidential to a certain extent as there are competitors waiting to hear what the Minister will say during the public sittings of the committee.

I see that Senator Doody, the chairman of the committee is here; I thought that we had agreed that the Minister would appear in camera so we could examine the problem in depth. If the problem is considered by the Committee on National Finance with public hearings and so on, I am convinced that we will never get the answers we want.

If we could sit in camera, we may have better results. I believe that we should consider that. In any case, Senator Doody himself might have a chance to speak on that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is this a question, an answer, or what?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: It is both.

[English]

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I appreciate the observations of Senator Leblanc. I would be prepared to meet with the committee in the normal way for a proportion of the time, and to debate the general policy issues in that fashion.

The in camera suggestion which I made, and which you well recall, relates to very specific commercial data which it is not in the public interest to disclose to our competitors or, indeed, to our customers. I am prepared to have an in camera discussion of some of those aspects if I have the undertaking of the members of the committee to treat those particular aspects in great confidence.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, Senator Austin's recollection of our understanding is an accurate one. At the last meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance when we discussed the Canadair financing, certain questions were raised about de Havilland and the minister told us that he was not prepared to present the government's case at that particular time since there were data to be prepared or financial statements that had not yet arrived. At that time, we discussed an in camera meeting to obtain certain supporting background data on the Canadair situation. That was agreed to, and we also agreed to discuss, in camera, certain aspects of de Havilland.

I would suggest to the committee members and to the minister that perhaps a mixed meeting might be appropriate.

[Senator Austin.]

We could start off with an open meeting and then later have an in camera session to look at the classified data.

Perhaps the minister could tell me why he is so anxious to appear before the House of Commons to present his report or to table the information there before he does so in the Senate. My own feeling is that, since the minister is a member of this chamber, it may be more appropriate for him to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance first, rather than the Commons committee, in order to show to the public at large that this is a significant chamber deserving of the attention of the minister and his department. Perhaps we may be able to ask our questions in a relatively intelligent manner that will enlighten the public. I would ask him to reconsider his choice of chamber and perhaps do us the honour of appearing first before the Senate committee.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the reason for the tabling of the financial statements in the other place first is that, under the Financial Administration Act, I am obliged to lay these financial statements before Parliament within 15 days. Indeed, given the preparation of the statements and their translation, my first opportunity will be on Friday of this week. Therefore, I will not be able to present them to this chamber unless the Senate is also sitting on Friday.

On the question of appearing first before a Senate committee, I believe that I made that offer this evening. I will also appear before a committee of the other place whenever the members of that committee and I can arrange a mutually convenient opportunity. I said that I would be prepared to meet before the end of next week with the members of the Senate committee. It may well be that the discussion of de Havilland will be presented first to that committee.

Senator Roblin: When the minister appears before the committee, I wonder if he would be prepared to consider a discussion of the current business relationship between General Dynamics Limited and Canadair. I believe there is a continuing joint activity of those two companies, and it might be useful to determine exactly what that activity is.

I particularly ask the minister whether or not the association between Canadair and General Dynamics Limited is reflected in any way in the Canadair update report of March, 1984. Is it involved in some way in their figures, and if it is, perhaps that could be made plain to us.

Senator Austin: None of the Canadair financial statements involves anything on its balance sheets other than to reflect the fact that General Dynamics is a tenant of Canadair. I might add that that arrangement was entered into at the time Canadair was acquired from General Dynamics in 1976.

There were a great many statements made in error in the other place by Mr. Blenkarn, and I am delighted to have an opportunity in committee to correct those errors. I also want to say that what is happening now is that the lease arrangement is under negotiation between General Dynamics and Canadair.

It is rather unfortunate that an officer of General Dynamics, in order to assist in its commercial discussions, has decided to make a political issue of the relationship between Canadair and General Dynamics. I very much regret Members of Parliament being used in that way. I hope that Canadair and General Dynamics can effect a commercial conclusion without political intermediation at the invitation of General Dynamics.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I wonder what the basis is for my honourable friend's statement of political interference. The only document I have—and there may be others; and if so, he could advise me of them—is a copy of a letter General Dynamics wrote to Canadair in which it discussed in a straightforward and business-like way the advisability of either buying a certain plant facility of Canadair or having it modernized to make it more efficient in its operation. Are there other initiatives on the part of General Dynamics to which my honourable friend objects?

Senator Austin: Senator Roblin, could you tell us how you came by that commercial correspondence?

Senator Roblin: I certainly can; it was handed to me by a member of the research team—no, it was handed to me by a member of the House of Commons. That is how I received it. How he got it, I do not know, but what difference does that make? It is just a simple business letter and has no political implications whatsoever, and if this is the only document, I find it hard to believe that the minister can accuse them of political interference. What use politicians may make of it is something else, but what General Dynamics did is, it seems to me, perfectly straightforward.

As far as I am concerned, I am asking the minister a question on policy which I think is perfectly legitimate and cannot be described as being crassly political, although I admit that occasionally politics do get into this chamber.

Senator Austin: It is rather delightful to have you deny the political character of your intervention while intervening in a political format. You are serving the very purpose of General Dynamics' desire to bring the political process into their commercial negotiation with Canadair.

I suggest to you that members of your party in the other place were approached directly by an officer of General Dynamics with a cockamamie story about Canadair and its management capacities, a subject about which they know nothing, and they provided additional information which is erroneous.

I would be very pleased, indeed, to describe the circumstances of that information to persons in the other place before the Senate committee, if I should be directly questioned.

But I think my point is very well made. I am suggesting that General Dynamics, through one of its officers, came to members of the other place who, in turn, decided very unwisely to involve themselves in what is totally a commercial relationship between Canadair and General Dynamics, and those members did so for partisan political advantage, and here you are reinforcing the game plan.

Senator Flynn: Why would you say that?

Senator Austin: Because of the fact that Senator Roblin is holding a letter and cannot name the source or will not name the source; I think "cannot" is more appropriate.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You are not a lawyer.

Senator Austin: Why you have that letter and why you are intervening I think speaks for itself.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is peculiar. He says that General Dynamics is doing this for crass political advantage. Well, that must be based on the assumption that somebody else apart from my honourable friend will be minister one of these days, because certainly he is not going to get any political advantage—

Senator Austin: Crass commercial advantage!

Senator Roblin: It is the same thing. This is a crown corporation which has received $1.350 billion of debt forgiven; this is a crown corporation that has not made money in a donkey's age; this is a crown corporation which has been rife with mismanagement, as the minister himself has been forced to admit, and yet when anyone asks a question about the commercial operations of that company it is considered to be out of bounds. That cannot be the case. If it is a crown corporation, the minister will have to answer questions with respect to what goes on in that crown corporation, and the minister can talk all he likes but we will continue to ask our questions, and when he appears before the committee we will expect a fuller explanation.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I cannot help but stand once more to say that Senator Roblin is digging himself in very, very deeply. He is backing one party in a commercial discussion—a tenant of Canadair—and I think that there is no public policy aspect to that particular negotiation. If there is, I should like him to tell us what it is. All I see is Senator Roblin—and it is unusual for him—lending himself to a commercial caper, something that politicians should be very wary of being used in.

Senator Flynn: Just think of the guy who was involved in the uranium cartel telling us these things. For goodness sake, you should be ashamed of yourself.

Senator Roblin: I do not know about commercial capers, but when it comes to political capers my honourable friend is a past master. There is nobody who can do that better than he. If we were in a less distinguished environment than the Senate, I think I would call him a flimflam artist, because he is a man who can present a bad case in the most attractive light. He is better at that than anyone I know. I am not taking sides, as he very well knows; I am asking for information, and there is a great deal of difference. I think I will continue to ask for information when the minister appears before the committee.

Senator Austin: Perhaps I owe Senator Roblin an apology; I thought he was pursuing the line of questioning followed by Mr. Blenkarn—

Senator Flynn: You do not understand the questions that are being put to you.

Senator Austin: —otherwise I cannot imagine the reason he rose at all.

As far as Senator Flynn is concerned, I do want to say that the uranium cartel arrangement was one of the most important—

Senator Flynn: I know that.

Senator Austin: —policy matters the Government of Canada has been involved in. It was for the defence of—

Senator Flynn: It was a good caper.

Senator Austin: —thousands of Canadians in uranium-dependent communities and industries. I am really surprised that you have raised arguments that indicate that you have no concern about that industry or the people involved in it.

Senator Flynn: I do have those concerns. That is not the point; the point is that you were hiding things at that time.

Senator Roblin: Why not come clean?

Senator Austin: There is nobody with cleaner hands.

Hon. David Walker: A year from now you won't be talking that way, sonny.

Senator Doody: I wonder if I could ask the minister of the pristine paws to elaborate on—

Senator Austin: I just want to say that Senator Walker has said that a year from now they will put me in jail. I consider that to be one of the most offensive remarks possible, and I intend to take the remedies appropriate to that remark, Senator Walker.

• (2040)

Senator Walker: I made no such statement.

Senator Roblin: He didn't say that.

Senator Austin: I heard him say it.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: He didn't say that.

Senator Austin: I heard him say that and if he denies he said it—

Senator Walker: Honi soit qui mal y pense!

Senator Austin: —and if it does not show up in Hansard, I will consider what to do, but I heard him say it.

Senator Donahoe: You don't know enough to apologize.

Senator Doody: The minister said that the documents have to be tabled within 15 days of something.

Senator Austin: After the end of the fiscal year.

Senator Doody: The record does not show within 15 days of what. There is no reference point in there. Could the minister tell us from what date those 15 days started to run with the result that the time expired on this particular Friday when this particular chamber is not sitting. I think it is important that the record show why the documents are not being tabled in this house and are being tabled in the other place first. If it is 15 days within the date of something or other, then that Friday, obviously, is the deadline and the minister cannot go beyond that date, but I think we should show that on the record.

Senator Austin: It is 15 days after the end of the fiscal year, which is March 31, and due to the time taken to prepare these statements and to translate them, I am not going to be able to table them before Friday, April 13.

Senator Doody: Perhaps when the minister is dealing with these various crown corporations for which he is responsible, it might be appropriate to try to have the documents prepared in time so that he can report to the chamber of which he is a member rather than to the other place. If he leaves it right to the fifteenth day, then, obviously he is boxed in. If you could impress upon the minions who work for you in these various and sundry multimillion dollar corporations that you rule to respect the dignity of this house and your responsibility as minister to it, it would be gratifying to have the reporting done here rather than in the other place.

Senator Austin: I, too, would prefer that. This chamber is lately following the interests of the other place which called upon me to give evidence several times in 1983. Whenever I can bring any matter to the attention of this chamber, I do so as expeditiously as possible.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, concerning the relationship between General Dynamics and Canadair—

Senator Flynn: This is secret material.

Senator Leblanc: —concerning the relationship between those two companies, I believe that when the minister comes before the committee, it will be important to know exactly what is the present relationship. If they are merely tenants, what proportion of the space are they occupying at Canadair? What rent are they paying? How much does this rent represent per square foot? Indeed, we need as many details as possible if we are to be able to assess somewhat the relationship which presently exists, because this cannot be seen from the financial statements. As I was saying a minute ago, financial statements do not give us much information. In order for us to know what is really going on, in order to exercise our judgment, we must go beyond the figures and examine the facts. So, I believe it is rather important, Mr. Minister, that you be prepared to give us as much information as possible.

[English]

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I will certainly try to bring the information which the committee would like to have and which will be of advantage to the committee. I am saying, and I want to say it very clearly, that I would not like to see a committee of this chamber or the other chamber try to second guess the commercial judgments of management as to what is in the interest of the corporation.

EXPO '86

BRITISH COLUMBIA—LABOUR DISPUTE

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, tonight is Senator Austin's night.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): In a manner of speaking.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I don't know if he believes that.

Senator Buckwold: I believe he is beginning to get the message.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): What message?

Senator Buckwold: There are stories in the newspapers about some threat to the holding of Expo '86 in British Columbia. I believe that I am correct that you are the minister in charge, and without in any way being critical, I thought it might be advantageous for this chamber to be informed as to what is going on, and whether there is a federal government role in this situation because of the interests of the federal government and whether there is an update on developments.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You had better ask Senator Perrault.

Senator Austin: When Senator Buckwold said that he thinks I am beginning to get the message, I did not understand his reference. I would not mind having it clarified because I certainly have the message of the opposition and I think I have been dealing with their message.

With regard to Expo '86, while I value the question, the policy of the government has been to avoid intervening in the labour dispute and in the provincial government's labour policies relating to Expo '86. The events taking place are on the site for which the Province has responsibility. The Government of Canada site is fully contracted and happens to be contracted to union companies, so there is not an issue of the union and non-union members working side by side. I think that the settlement of the labour policy questions would not be expedited by the federal government offering opinions at this time.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, perhaps not as a supplementary, I should just like to explain to the honourable senator that my reference to the effect that he got the message was in no way denigrating his position in the Senate and did not refer to what was happening tonight. It was merely an expression of my high opinion of him and the fact that all the questions this evening have been directed to him. That was really the implication of what I had to say. I certainly had no criticism of the very able minister.

Senator Asselin: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, we just heard a mutual admiration duel, but I want to ask Senator Austin, since he criticizes Senator Roblin for the questions he puts to him saying that he was taking the side of General Dynamics, if he thinks that Senator Leblanc was doing the same thing or is it acceptable because it comes from Senator Leblanc.

Senator Austin: I did not hear Senator Leblanc do more than ask me for some information that is sought in an impartial way, but I cannot forget that Senator Roblin belongs to a party that has raised this question in the other place in a highly interventionist way—

Senator Flynn: But he did not.

Senator Austin: —and I saw a commonality of purpose. However, I said that if I was in error—

Senator Flynn: Well, you are.

Senator Austin: —in seeing that common line of questioning between Senator Roblin and Mr. Blenkarn then, of course, I would take Senator Roblin's word that he is only interested in receiving information and is in no way espousing a commercial cause.

Senator Roblin: I admit to being a politician, but I accept my honourable friend's explanation.

SPORTS POOL

ATHLETIC CONTESTS AND EVENTS POOLS ACT— FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to questions asked by Senators Asselin and Flynn on April 3, 1984. The answer is relatively long and I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, the federal government will not await the decision of the court before it starts operating the sports pool. The product is "on line" and introduction is imminent. Other options are not being discussed at the moment.

Offices are open in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa although they are not yet fully operational.

Insofar as staffing is concerned, it is true that some personnel have been hired to administer the sports pool. The government is now in the process of interviewing wholesalers who will be responsible for the retail outlets. There are also people who have been hired on a temporary basis to sign up retailers until the wholesalers are in place. So far, there are 15,000 retail outlets in Canada which have signed up for the sports pool.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

USE OF AMERICAN AIRCRAFT FOR FIRE-FIGHTING OPERATIONS IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions asked by Senator Phillips on March 8, 1984, concerning the use of American aircraft for fire-fighting operations in the Northwest Territories in lieu of the Canadair CL-215 waterbomber. This answer is also fairly long and I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows):

The referenced aircraft, the DC-6 and the A-26, were converted by commercial operators for forest fire fighting purposes to be operated from land based airports particularly in locations where no suitable lakes are available for amphibious flying boat operations. In addition to the DC-6 (formerly used in the 1950s for passenger cargo work) and the A-26 (converted second world war bomber), other aircraft like the CS3F (Tracker) and the Canso (an amphibian of second world war vintage) are used. All these aircraft have been converted especially for this purpose from former surplus (low cost) passenger or military aircraft. The contracts referred to by Senator Phillips require the operators to use retardant chemicals for forest fire fighting purposes which is normally mixed and added at land based airports.

It should be noted that the CL-215 and Canso are used predominantly in those provinces having lakes or other water areas suitable for scooping by the aircraft although these aircraft may also carry retardant chemicals.

The CL-215, manufactured by Canadair, has a load capability equal to one-half that of the DC-6 but one and one-half times greater than the A-26. The aircraft is, however, capable of both land and water operation and is the only new fire fighting aircraft in production in the world today. It is precisely the shortfall in modern fire fighting aircraft that has resulted in the Government's initiative to upgrade the nation's capability in this regard and enter into agreements with provincial governments to establish a National CL-215 Fire Bomber Fleet. Under this agreement four (4) CL-215 Aircraft have been purchased by the Federal Government for use in the Territories. Deliveries, however, will not take place until 1986.

Once delivered it is intended that the CL-215 aircraft will be maintained and operated by private industry under contract from the Federal/Territorial Governments.

LIBERAL PARTY LEADERSHIP

STATEMENT BY HON. DONALD JOHNSTON, P.C.

Hon. Martial Asselin: In view of the fact that one of the leadership candidates, Mr. Johnston, has come out against the federal government setting up sports lotteries, can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the cabinet will withdraw from those sports lotteries? Is there so much disagreement within the cabinet that this project will be shelved?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the position of the government is well known and it is unchanged.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Does the same apply to the question of selling the gas stations of Petro-Canada?

Senator Olson: The answer to that question is yes.

Senator Flynn: Is the principle of cabinet solidarity abandoned at this time until the leadership convention is over?

Senator Olson: The answer to that question is no. I would be prepared to elaborate, but perhaps it would not be an elaboration sufficient to completely convince Senator Flynn.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You can be sure of that.

Senator Flynn: You would be well advised to keep it to yourself.

ECONOMIC AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND GENERAL DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Question No. 1 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

What is the list of the 13 specific proposals submitted to the Federal Government by the Province of Newfoundland under the Canada-Newfoundland General Development Agreement?

Reply by the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development

The 13 proposals submitted to the Federal Government by the Province of Newfoundland under the Canada-Newfoundland General Development Agreement are listed as follows:

- Fisheries
- Institute of Fisheries and Maritime Technology
- Agriculture
- Newfoundland and Labrador Development Corporation
- Rural Development
- Ocean Research and Development (NORDCO)
- FESP (Forest Economic Stimulation Program)
- Management Training
- Industrial Development
- Mineral Development
- Corner Brook Harbour Development
- Surveying and Mapping
- Secondary Roads

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I just received an answer to a question on the Order Paper. As usual, it is old news. It has to do with the 13 specific proposals submitted to the federal government by the Province of Newfoundland under the Canada-Newfoundland General Development Agreement. I was provided the list of 13 in a letter which I received about two weeks ago.

Since the annual agreement expired on March 31, I would like whoever is responsible in the other place to advise us as to when the agreements will be signed for these 13 specific initiatives between the Province of Newfoundland and the Government of Canada.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all I can do is take notice of the question. I frankly admit that I do not quite understand all of it, but certainly Hansard will clarify it so that I can see precisely what Senator Marshall is asking for.

Senator Marshall: I can express it a little more clearly: Why don't they get off their butts and answer the question?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is clear enough.

CANADIAN YOUTH

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hébert, seconded by the Honourable Senator Le Moine:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Canadian youth between 15 and 24 years of age;

That the Committee be composed of 12 Senators to be designated at a later date;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of the professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than March 1, 1985, and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That the motion be amended in the first paragraph by

1) deleting the words "a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed" and substituting therefor the following words: "the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized", and

2) deleting all remaining paragraphs.—(Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.).

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, when the Senate considered this motion, I decided to adjourn the debate to get some information on the advisability of appointing another special committee of the Senate.

I also wanted to read the remarks made before the Senate by my colleagues, Senator Marshall and Senator Roblin, to express doubts about the advisability of appointing such a committee. Our party was not questioning the importance or the substance of the issue at stake, and especially not the competence of the man who might be the chairman of the special committee, Senator Hébert. I admit that Senator Hébert has been very active in the past and that he is still very much concerned about the problems of youth. I have no intention of challenging his expertise in that field.

We have to state our position with respect to a principle which seems to be gaining currency. The Senate does have a fair number of standing committees and, each time they sit, we find it difficult to ensure that they all have a quorum. In addition, whenever a subject a little unusual comes up, the reaction is to set up a special committee. There are people in the Senate who want to build their own little empires. We have seen that often in the past. I am not referring to Senator Hébert, because he has just joined us. But we did see some senators who were very fond of chairing their own little committee. I am not saying that the questions under consideration were not important, but surely they could just as easily have been examined by the standing Senate committees.

So, here we are being asked once again to appoint a special committee to consider the problems and issues facing youth. And yet, honourable senators, a department has just been established with a minister responsible for youth problems. I thought that Senator Hébert, who is quite knowledgeable about those problems, could have been appointed special adviser to the minister, Madame Payette, who is busy building up her department, hiring experts and people who are familiar with the problems of youth, and drafting policies. Besides, we learned recently that those policies will be implemented or announced in June. That is why we are wondering whether a Senate committee might not be anything more than a duplication of efforts, especially when we consider what the present government usually does with committee reports. My God, I have no idea how many times I sat on various committees when I was in the House of Commons and since I have been in the Senate. I would say that practically all reports submitted by committees of which I was a member were completely ignored.

The 1972 Committee on the Constitution was never mentioned because, of course, it tabled a minority report which is something not to be discussed. There was a committee that dealt with Bill C-60 and because the Supreme Court ruled that the federal Parliament had no right to reform or change the Senate without the approval of the provinces, the report on Bill C-60 was set aside and we never heard about it.

Senator Molgat, was vice-chairman of a group of senators who travelled all across Canada asking people what they thought about Senate reform. I believe that we worked hard in order to present a good report. This report was tabled in the Senate and is now being discussed, but we have not yet heard the Government's response to it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): There was something of a response this evening.

Senator Asselin: I am told that there was a response this evening. I hope so. In any case, if my comments happened to provoke or influence the statement made by the Government, I am quite happy about it. However, until now, there had not been any response except that Mr. Trudeau said in Quebec City during a debate on federal institutions that it might be a good thing to look closely at the report of the committee on Senate reform. In other words, the Government wanted to use this as an election platform; I have nothing against that. I am under the impression that the problem today is whether or not there will be a duplication of efforts since both the new Ministry for Youth and a Senate committee will be examining the problems of our young people. The problems of our young people are easy to understand. They want jobs. When I meet with young people in my region, they do not ask me what they are going to do, but simply: "Have you managed to find jobs for us?" This appeal is also addressed to the private sector. Young people want to build a future for themselves and they want jobs. Even if we were to set up a committee that will tell them that they are to be retrained to give them better opportunities in technological areas, what young people want is to have jobs. What they want the Government to tell them is how it will find them jobs. That is the problem facing young Canadians. There is nothing else. Young people want to build a future for themselves, but they are not given the chance to do so. I do not know how the Government can give them such a chance or how a Senate Committee can do so when young people have been asking for new job creation policies for the past four years. The Government is finding it hard to develop new policies because we are going through a tough period for the economy. I was told this afternoon that the Leader of the Government, before a Senate Committee, simply said that committees must stop travelling across Canada and that we must stop setting up all kinds of new committees.

I believe that he has a point. I am told that the Leader of the Government made these comments at the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and added: "You are needed in Ottawa, in the Senate." He had a point there because we present a rather high rate of absenteeism in the Senate. The attendance rate is just short of ridiculous. We are going to set up committees which will travel all across Canada and hire experts to examine problems that another Minister is now considering—finding jobs for our young people.

I believe that we are duplicating the efforts of a Department which is just getting organized. I do not know whether Mrs. Hervieux-Payette has approved of the setting up of this committee, but I have the feeling that she is not too happy to see that we shall be duplicating the efforts and the activities of her Department, which she is just organizing.

If we agree to set up this special committee, we shall have also to agree to set up the committee proposed by Senator

[Senator Asselin.]

Watt. I listened to him the other night when he moved his motion. I think that people with his ethnic background have needs. The Senate should make a point of looking at minority problems. The people in front of me who are representing the government, more specifically the Leader and the Deputy Leader, should also agree to setting up the committee proposed by Senator Watt.

• (2100)

[English]

I will repeat in English what I said, for the benefit of Senator Watt. I said that we have proposed formation of a committee, which I believe is for a good purpose. If we accept this new special committee on youth, why should we refuse yours? We would have to accept yours too.

[Translation]

I too should like to propose to the Senate a new committee which I feel lies within its competence. Honourable senators know that Quebec did not sign the constitutional document in 1982. They are aware that some provinces could get financial compensations for opting out of a joint scheme.

I suggest it is essential that Quebec should be able to sign the 1982 Constitutional document. Nothing has been done for the past two years. Ever since the Constitution was patriated, the Senate has not acted on this very important problem which results in the isolation of some of the Canadian people from the Constitution of their country.

You may want to punish the Quebec government. It is not the Quebec government that you are punishing, honourable senators, but the Quebec people. I had thought of proposing the setting up of a special committee to deal with this issue and suggesting to the government proposals which might convince the Quebec National Assembly to sign the 1982 Constitutional document.

If I move the creation of the committee, I believe the government could not turn down my proposal. We on this side of the House are restricted by our limited number of senators. You can create the committee tonight, honourable senators. The problem is that this committee could very well comprise members from the government side only because we on this side will not be able to participate. We do not have the strength to do it, we barely have the minimum number of senators to make up the quorum on the standing committees of the Senate.

Do not ask us to participate in yet another committee. As long as there is no willingness to appoint more senators to help us in our parliamentary tasks, we will not be able to accept any additional workload.

So I tell honourable Senator Hébert: "Have it your way, create your committee and hold hearings throughout Canada; however, your committee could very well be made up of Liberal senators only".

At the same time, you will take away from standing committees of the Senate all of their significance and credibility.

It would mean that the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs would only be asked to consider legislation. For anything else, a special committee would be set up, a senator would be empowered to build his own little empire and conduct a year-long study of a problem which a regular committee could examine.

I am trying to be fair. I have nothing against Senator Hébert being allowed to set up a committee on youth. On the contrary, if he wants a committee, he can have it. I am only saying that such a committee would entail expenditures and I stress once again all the reasons I gave a while ago.

Honourable senators, I think we could at least wait for the Minister of State for Youth to set up the structure of her department and put forward policies for young people.

Afterwards, if we can help in some way or other, we will offer our assistance. Let the Minister of State for Youth first establish her department, hire experts and appoint her officials. Let her introduce her policies for youth on behalf of the government.

Even if we provided every solution to help young people find jobs, if the government fails to act upon our recommendations, all our work will be of no avail.

I would rather wait until the minister has developed her policies, and then we would see how the Senate could be of help with its own proposals.

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: May I ask the honourable senator a question? He says that the reports of Senate committees have not been acted upon. Is it not true that the manpower study of the National Finance Committee brought in 56 recommendations, of which the government accepted 52? Did not the study and report of the Science Policy Committee result in the formation of the Ministry of Science? Senator Croll provided statistics to show how many recommendations of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada had been accepted. Did not the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Immigration Policy result in a completely new Immigration Act? Is it not true that the committees have been very useful in the past?

Senator Asselin: What about the Committee on the Constitution in 1972, and what about the committee dealing with Bill C-60? Nothing happened.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): If Senator Asselin is saying that the minister is now busy setting up a division to deal with the problems of youth, would he not like the Senate to have some input into that, and is this not the best way of getting the Senate involved? I do not understand why the honourable senator wants to resist the Senate's getting involved and being helpful in that situation, when it is in its formative stages.

• (2110)

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I think that the minister did not understand. We can prevent duplication in the same field, we ought to be careful not to spend taxpayers' money unadvisedly. We are going to examine the same problems which the minister will be considering—finding jobs for young people. What more do we need?

Hon. Joseph-Phillippe Guay: The reason is that the Senate committees are better!

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Guay wants to sit on that committee.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I listened attentively to Senator Asselin. I have to say that I share his reservations. I understand the problems raised about his party. What I find difficult to believe, however, is that he is unable to find in his party a few senators who, like me, think that this problem is not like the others. We are talking about a whole generation being lost. We often raise very serious problems here. It is our duty to put forward those problems that are of concern to us but that one is more serious than others.

I know that most of you still have young children or grandchildren. Many of you have lived personally the tragedy of youth in the eighties. If the problem is so serious, I cannot and will not believe that Senator Asselin's party will not be able to find a few senators who will make a fantastic effort to sit on this committee. As Guynemer said: "Human strength has limits beyond which one must always go . . . in exceptional circumstances". This is one of them.

Senator Asselin is right when he says that one important answer to the problem would be to provide jobs for the 650,000 young jobless. Senator Asselin knows as well as I do that this government or any other, despite its best efforts, cannot find 650,000 jobs overnight for our unemployed youth. We are just coming out of a recession. It is still with us though. Job opportunities for youth are still few. I am sure that Senator Asselin will agree that a miracle cannot happen in this area. I want to remind him as well that unemployment is not the only problem facing young people. I disagree with the honourable senator when he says: Let us find them a job and all their problems will be solved.

Senator Asselin: Some of their problems.

Senator Hébert: I am sorry, it is not true, this is not good enough. I agree that it would solve at least some of their problems. However, it is not the only cause for our young people's helplessness, as Senator Asselin is well aware. I read in a paper a few days ago that according to a survey made in the United States—very often, by the way, our surveys come to the same conclusions as theirs—30 per cent of young Americans are convinced that a nuclear war will break out in the coming years. They may be wrong, I hope so. The fact of the matter is that they are sure of it, and young Canadians feel the same. When you start in life at 20 expecting a nuclear slaughter, it is not a fear we had when we were young.

Drug problems are not entirely due to unemployment. They cannot be, because they start in school. Today, we find young people in elementary and high schools, even in the remotest areas, who are destroying themselves with drugs. These youngsters surely are not unemployed. There must be a way of knowing why. Read current issues of La Presse, Senator Asselin. How come there are so many—

Senator Asselin: I rise on a point of order. Senator Hébert is straying from the subject. He will not convince me that there does not exist a drug problem among our young people. He will not convince me that there are no other problems either. The major problem he would like to curtail is unemployment. What he is saying is completely irrelevant. He should not try to make me feel sorry about drug problems, because I know as much about that as he does. I have been practising law for close to thirty years now. I have seen all those problems and I am still aware of them every day. Honourable Senator Hébert should keep to the terms of reference of the committee, then I will be with him. I am not impressed by him when he wanders from the subject.

Senator Hébert: I do not think that I am wandering from the subject; in fact, I have the motion before me. It asks us to examine the problems and the difficulties of young Canadians under 25. I should point out that Senator Asselin has emphasized the problem of unemployment. I am simply trying to tell him that this is not the only problem.

Senator Asselin has been very kind to me, probably because my appointment to the Senate is quite recent. He suggested that my ambition was not to create for myself an empire, as others apparently have done. He is right; I am not trying to create an empire for myself. He was very kind to say that I am something of an expert on youth problems. This was very kind of him, but it is inaccurate. While it is true that I have devoted myself or a great part of my energies to young people during the last thirteen years, I still feel ignorant and overwhelmed by the complexity of young people's problems in the 1980's.

This is why I would have hoped that a committee like this one could be made up of senators from both sides of the house who share my special concern about this problem and that, by working seriously on this matter, this committee could fuel the imagination of 25 million Canadians. I do not believe that we cannot, through a serious effort on our part, find solutions which could be of use to the Minister for Youth and which would in addition give new hope to young Canadians. It is our duty, honourable senators, not only to say that the existing committee could deal with this issue, and I do not deny that it could, but in view of the present situation and the anguish of young people today, we have to do better and show them that the Senate is really concerned and will deal with their problems. It is not enough to say that we shall deal with this issue in the ordinary way. In view of the seriousness of the situation, we must say that we shall deal with it in an extraordinary way by creating a special committee. This perception of our concern for them would give some hope to our young people.

Hon. Philip Deane Gigantes: Honourable senators, if I understand correctly, Senator Asselin is saying that there is a Department of Youth and a Minister of State for Youth. Having a Senate committee examine the same subject would therefore be a duplication. On the basis of that argument, all Senate committees should be abolished because we do have ministers to look after the issues considered by those committees. Or perhaps I fail to see the logic.

Senator Asselin: You will understand some day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it. Motion in amendment negatived, on division.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with respect to this point, I would like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government a question. At a meeting of the Standing Rules and Orders Committee a few weeks ago it was decided that the subject of youth affairs should be dealt with by the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee. If the honourable senator is not playing around with this chamber because of the position he has then is it reasonable to assume that the motion should be referred to the social affairs committee? Is he making a mockery of this place again, something which he has been doing since I came here? He could not care less what is going on.

An Hon. Senator: You are out of order.

Senator Marshall: Why don't you abolish the place? You are a phoney!

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question has been addressed to the Deputy Leader or the House Leader of this place. The preamble to the question is absolutely unacceptable.

Senator Marshall: I do not care what it is.

Senator Olson: That is fine.

Senator Marshall: You have no idea of responsibility. You have given up. You are subservient to the PMO. You could not care less—it is a shame to the people of Canada.

Senator Olson: I want Senator Marshall to know that these tricks he tries once in awhile are not acceptable on any grounds. It is not proper to ask the House Leader or the Deputy Leader on this side a question based on the type of preamble he has made.

Senator Marshall: You are making a mockery of this place.

Senator Olson: That is not a mockery.

Senator Marshall: Of course it is.

THE BUDGET SPEECH

PROPOSALS BY MINISTER OF FINANCE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith calling the attention of the Senate to the proposals contained in the Budget Speech made by the Minister of Finance in the other place on 15th February, 1984.—(Honourable Senator Anderson)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at the last sitting of the house I mistakenly asked that this order stand in the name of Senator Anderson instead of Senator Côtteau. I did that because I misread the number of the order. I ask that the order stand again in the name of Senator Côtteau.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I am right, all orders to No. 10 stand.

Hon. Jack Marshall: What about order No. 8? What do you propose to do with respect to a special committee on fisheries? You're a phoney!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I said, I expect all other orders stand.

SENATE REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate, tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1984.—(Honourable Senator Flynn P.C.)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I moved the adjournment of this debate for a senator whose name I would eventually make known. I am pleased to inform the Senate that he is Senator Arthur Tremblay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I regret having to lengthen the sitting this evening by almost half an hour, when it could have been plain sailing through the orders of the day if we had followed the suggestion of Senator Flynn. However, I should explain why I have to lay this burden on you this evening. In the past three or four sittings, as agreed with my leader, I was supposed to speak on the reform of the Senate, but every time the lively debates, the significant problems discussed and the exchanges which sometimes ran high caused us to extend the sitting hours, thus testing the strength of the members of this House.

I therefore apologize for having to ask you to sit an additional half hour to reflect, hopefully, on my comments regarding the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform.

Since Senator Molgat tabled the report and gave us a broad as well as concise, specific and unbiased outline—for which I thank him—several senators have taken part in the debate. Indeed, I think that six senators have done so. I can assure you that we have noted some differences in their style, but what struck me, and was perhaps to be expected, but I must admit that I did not expect it, is that all those statements concurred on one point. They unanimously reject the main recommendation of the committee that Canadians should directly elect their representatives to the Senate.

● (2130)

On other points, however, they were far from being unanimous. For example, on the necessity of Senate reform, what should be the shape of that reform? A few speakers made quick and incidental allusions to it in the course of their remarks. However, they did so in such general terms that one could not have a clear idea of the thrust of that reform. Others did not even mention their views on the matter.

Regarding this very general concept as to whether there should be Senate reform, Senator Steuart was the only one to provide particular suggestions.

It is certainly not my intention to pass judgment on the relevance of the remarks made by those who spoke before me or to question the legitimacy of their remarks. My intention is rather to inscribe into our debate a pragmatic approach, a willingness on the part of members of this House to take concrete action.

It seems to me that the Senate could and should initiate, on its own and as soon as possible, the process leading to its own reform. It is in that perspective that I would like to analyse the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform.

From this point of view, the proposals made in the seventh and last chapter of this report obviously have priority over more radical and necessarily longer term recommendations made in the previous chapters.

Indeed, the members of the committee are using the same perspective in the following quotations taken from the beginning of this chapter which is devoted to more immediately visible reforms.

Having stated that "... putting in place an elected Senate will require constitutional amendment involving the consent of Parliament and of the specified number of legislative assemblies ..." they add:

All this will take time. Meanwhile, certain useful reforms to the present Senate, requiring action only by Parliament or by the Senate itself, should be introduced without delay.

They even go further and state:

Nevertheless, in the interval before an elected Senate could be put in place, the operation of the reformed chamber would provide the basis for assessing how much more effective an appointed Senate could be and whether our judgment that direct election is necessary is justified.

In other words, the implementation of the Committee's main conclusion, namely, "that the Canadian Senate should be elected directly by the people of Canada", for the report itself is to some extent dependent upon the results which the recommendations contained in the 7th chapter and others of the same kind could bring about in the light of the proposed objectives of this reform:

Our primary objective . . . I borrow at random from the report; instead of reading complete texts and quotations, I will summarize, and I hope you will know from the tone of my voice when I am quoting and when I am not.

Our primary objective is to strengthen the Senate's capacity to fill its role of regional representation.

To this end . . .

—any reform should ensure that senators have more political authority and a measure of independence from party discipline.

Second objective:

Preserve and strengthen the Senate's capacity to improve the quality of legislation and to investigate questions of public policy and administration.

Third objective:

Preserve and strengthen the investigative role of nationwide issues, a role which the Senate has quite successfully assumed so far.

What are the reforms which can be implemented in the immediate future, thereby demonstrating how an elected Senate could be more efficient and whether, in a final analysis, direct election is necessary? The Committee mentions more than 10 of them; I shall limit myself to four: the selection of senators and their tenure; the powers of the Senate; and the internal organization of the Senate.

As to the selection of senators, senators are appointed by the Governor General, according to Clause 24 of the British North America Act, 1867, which reads as follows:

The Governor General shall from time to time, in the Queen's Name, by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, summon qualified Persons to the Senate.

In that matter as in many others, however, under the established conventions, the Governor General acts only after having taken the advice of the Privy Council and according to this advice, which means for all practical purposes that He summons to the Senate exclusively the persons the Prime Minister wishes to be appointed.

Now with only a few exceptions the Prime Minister recommends the appointment to the Senate only of persons clearly identified with his own political group.

No wonder then that the method of selection of senators has been the subject of the greatest criticisms before the committee. Some witnesses did not see anything wrong with the principle of appointment; it is its present application which, according to them, is open to abuse.

[Senator Tremblay.]

While recognizing the accuracy of such an observation, most members of the committee "do not believe that the alternative methods suggested in recent years would bring about any fundamental change". So the committee recommends to "retain the present method of selection until a system of direct election is put in place, but that it be used in a way that befits what we expect will be a more effective second chamber of Parliament".

When I read again the committee's report, I was somewhat disappointed that they did not go as far as I would have liked in trying to improve things in that area. However, the committee mentions three ways for the Prime Minister to exercise his prerogative in that respect.

First, the present composition of the Senate does not represent the social and cultural structure of Canada adequately. This is unacceptable. In filling the present vacancies, priority, in the committee's opinion, should be given to correcting this deficiency through the appointment of women, members of aboriginal groups, and members of cultural minorities.

Second, according to the committee, the Senate cannot perform in the manner intended by the Fathers of Confederation when the balance of representation between political parties at the national level diverges as sharply as it does today from current voting patterns. That is why they urge that new appointments correct this distortion.

Had not the committee's report been tabled at the end of January only, one could have believed that the Prime Minister acted in the appointments he made in mid-January, on the first suggestion dealing with a better representation for women, aboriginal groups and cultural minorities. But he obviously did not act on the second suggestion as far as providing a better balance in the distribution of seats among the parties, with the result that the situation is now as follows: 64 Liberals, 23 Progressive Conservatives, 4 Independents, and one Independent Liberal.

What about the 12 remaining vacancies? As for us, in the Opposition, the best we could wish for under the circumstances is probably that nothing happens before the next election. So, I will not insist on the third proposal, quite justified in principle, to the effect that every vacancy in the Senate must be filled within a six-month period. In this regard, however, the suggestions of the Committee concerning the length of the term for which senators would be appointed is not without interest.

The Committee wondered about the possibility of applying as of now to the new appointments the nine year term proposed for elected senators in accordance with the single member plurality system. This is how the constitutional problem should be analysed as a result of this proposal and the conclusion to be drawn:

The introduction of a fixed term would require an amendment to the Constitution. It is almost certain, however, that a nine-year term would not require the use of the general procedure of amendment, which brings provincial parliaments into play, because neither the Senate powers nor the selection method of the senators would be involved. The amendment would therefore be the responsibility of the Parliament, according to Clause 44 of the Constitutional Act of 1982. The Supreme Court could decide that a much shorter term than nine years would not be long enough for the senators to properly undertake any legislative review and would therefore be an abuse of the Senate's powers, demanding therefore the provinces' consent . . . But a single nine year term should not create any problem in that respect.

Personally, I am not convinced that this conclusion is absolutely irrefutable, but let us accept the Committee conclusion, at least for the time being. If it is well justified and irrefutable, the proposal made in the Fall of 1980 by the Lamontagne Committee, as it was called at that time—should we say for this part of the report, the Stanbury Committee, because if my memory serves me well, it is the Honourable Senator Stanbury who was the main architect of this part of the report.

Everybody is talking about the Lamontagne Committee. The proposal that committee made in the Fall of 1980 precisely on the terms of reference of the senators would be even less unquestionable. The committee report submits three recommendations on that matter if I may be allowed to remind the Senate:

First, senators should be appointed for a fixed term of ten years, renewable for further terms of five years upon the recommendation arrived at by secret ballot of a Senate committee set up for that purpose. Senators would continue to retire at 75.

Second, any senator who has attained the age of 65 years and has been serving for at least fifteen years (or who has attained the age of 70 years and has been a senator for at least ten years) should be entitled to resign, on full pension, with the usual pension for his or her widow or widower. (Similar provisions for judges are contained in the Judges Act).

By the way, the committee notes that the Judges act contains similar provisions.

Third, any senator who fails for two successive years to attend at least one-third of the sittings of the Senate in each of those years should forfeit his or her seat.

Perhaps that is something to be whispered.

This would replace the present section 31.1 of the British North America Act, under which the seat is forfeited if the senator fails to give any attendance whatever for two consecutive sessions.

As for the powers of the Senate, the Constitutional Law of 1982 is explicit. Any formal change to the powers of the Senate can only be made through the general amendment process and thus requires provincial participation.

To overcome that difficulty and proceed right away from an absolute to the suspensive veto that it is proposing for an elected Senate, the committee suggests a very ingenious procedure. Without formally lessening its constitutional powers, the Senate could adopt a procedure by which, practically, the use of the absolute veto would be equivalent to a suspensive veto.

In this regard, the report contains a long description of the procedure and I will not elaborate on this part of the report.

With the same intent of extending the role of the Senate, without a constitutional change of its powers, another measure could, according to the Committee, be implemented immediately. This measure would give the Senate the power to delay the adoption of measures.

The Standing Joint Committee, in its 1980 report, also mentioned this possibility referring to the Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which at the time, in the Fall of 1980, had just tabled its Fourth Report.

I will not go into details, but I would like to mention that already Senator Godfrey has tabled two motions which clearly relate to this recommendation of the Committee on Senate Reform, the importance of which can be judged in light of the huge amount of major legislation which is passed by regulation and other regulatory documents by the Governor in Council by authority conferred on him by Parliament.

Fourth, regarding the internal organization of the Senate, the Committee proposes first that: The Speaker of the Senate should no longer be chosen by the Governor General . . . That is to say, by the Prime Minister. . . rather, he should be elected by the senators themselves, just as the government or opposition leaders in the Senate should elect their own officers.

All senators of one province should meet in cross-party caucuses. Participation in such caucuses should not prevent senators from attending traditional party caucuses.

The Senate should continue exercising its investigatory power. It should, in particular, investigate inter-regional matters. Its main function, in the future, should be representing the regions.

Let us remember, by the way, that the Lamontagne Report tackled the same problems and went further and more explicitly in the same direction. In particular, it said:

We recommend the establishment—

Here is one for you, Senator Asselin:

—of a new Standing Committee on Regional Affairs.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Another one!

Senator Tremblay:

—The chairmen of the regional caucuses would form the nucleus of this committee—

Senator Asselin: We will need 200 senators.

Senator Tremblay: Or will have to change the nomination process.

The committee's mandate would be to receive reports from the regional caucuses; to identify regional problems and to recommend the best means for dealing with them; to inform provincial governments of federal bills that might affect regional interests, and to invite them to present their views to this committee and to other appropriate committees of the Senate.

That was formulated in 1980. It seems to me that since then, events have occurred which confirm that, in the perception of a greater number of provinces at least—and even perhaps of the general public—the representation of regional interests by the Senate is a reality which begins to establish itself. I shall refer to only two incidents. Let us remember what happened in the case of Bill S-31.

I think the Senate was, on that occasion, the instrument which made it possible to at least express regional interests. In the face of the difficulty in harmonizing the perception of the central authority and the perceptions which some provinces could have on that Bill, it was in fact hoisted.

We did not exercise the right of absolute or suspensive veto. Only the fact that the Senate, in the circumstances, was an adequate forum, made it possible for public opinion to structure itself in such a way that the government took it into consideration.

The second incident occurred last week with respect to Bill C-3. Seeing the way things had evolved in the previous months, noting that the mode of consultation of the federal Minister of Health did not allow them to express collectively their views in an adequate way on Bill C-3, the Ministers of Health, on the invitation of the committee chaired by Senator Bonnell put forward their view before the Senate. The House of Commons had not offered them an adequate forum. The Senate served that purpose. We do not know to what extent the Senate itself will be aware, in such specific circumstances, of the chance it has to be involved significantly in the federal legislative process, as a place, a forum and a mediator of regional interests when it is not even possible to express them adequately within the House of Commons.

[English]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Wait until he has finished.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: I am available for any question Senator Bosa might wish to ask, even difficult questions. I only need a few more minutes. I am asking him to be patient and I will welcome his questions later on.

Briefly, that is the type of reform proposed by the committee for the short term, with the initiative coming either from the Senate, from the Canadian Parliament, from the Prime Minister or from senators themselves and their political parties.

Assuming that is done and the only thing left for the longer term is implementing recommendations regarding the number of seats for each region and the way of electing senators or the formula asking for a double majority of francophone senators and of the whole Senate to pass language legislation, how could we assess the new situation resulting from these short term reforms?

[Senator Tremblay.]

It will surely be said that all these reforms are not the real reform which would alter radically the situation and would restore in the public the image of the Canadian Senate.

I readily admit such an assessment is justified. However, we should not underestimate the importance of the nine-year non-renewable mandate proposed by the committee for senators to be nominated in the future, or alternatively the ten-year mandate renewable for five years with the recommendation of the Senate itself proposed by the Lamontagne committee. I don't have the mandate to interpret Mr. Trudeau's ideas and I have never asked for such a mandate.

Senator Asselin: You can interpret Mr. Trudeau's ideas!

Senator Tremblay: I will read the document. We will accept it with all due respect as far as its substance is concerned but not necessarily its origin. I feel that such a change in the term or duration of a senator's mandate will alter the whole dynamics of this chamber. That would really be a very significant change.

In any event, the obviously necessary changes in the number of Senate seats and their distribution between all regions of Canada will have to be part of the real in depth reform of the Senate. Let us say that it might go as far as an elected Senate, a proposal which I endorse in the report. This agreement on an elected Senate would have to fit into the development I have just described. Constitutional amendments adopted after lengthy and difficult negotiations between governments would be necessary. But I do not think these negotiations can be undertaken in the near future. The present situation and developments in the next two or three years must be taken into account. At the federal level, 1984 will certainly be taken up by things quite different from major constitutional amendments and perhaps more fundamental and meaningful for the future of our country. The same can be said for 1985. In 1986, the same kind of activity will take place in Quebec, a province that still refuses to acknowledge, because of the way it was done, the legitimacy of the Constitutional patriation. Constitutional conferences are already planned up to 1987 on aboriginal rights.

Judging by the outcome of the last conference on the entrenchment of those rights in the Constitution, I get the impression that we will need all the conferences planned until 1987 to solve that problem, even if the Senate does set up a special committee as proposed by Senator Watt.

Senator Asselin: The Government will not agree to that.

Senator Tremblay: Even then, I tend to think that there will not be too many conferences up to 1987 to solve the main problems, let alone all the minor ones, relating to aboriginal rights.

Given those circumstances, it is my opinion, unless this delightfully academic debate on an elected Senate is used as an alibi to maintain the status quo as long as possible, that there is no other solution but to tackle Senate reform with more modest but more realistic objectives in mind. It has not even been mentioned.

Studies and reports on Senate reform have been numerous enough over the years, but nothing has changed, except perhaps minor things.

For my part, I would hate to see this report meet with the same fate as the previous ones, especially since the joint committee was aware of this possibility and tried to head it off by suggesting many reform measures that could be implemented immediately.

Thus, since everyone seems to agree, for instance, on the need for the Senate to be more representative of regional interests and to try to harmonize them in areas of federal jurisdiction, why not set up right now the regional caucuses suggested by the joint committee? Why can't we give the right emphasis to the work of these caucuses by channeling it to a Standing Senate Committee on Regional Affairs which was proposed by the Lamontagne committee as early as the autumn of 1980?

I know that in the climate that we have had in the past few days, there is a proliferation of committees. The simple suggestion that there be a Standing Committee on Regional Affairs—this recommendation was made in 1980 in a climate of suspicion and no action followed—but I will come back to that later on in my conclusion, when I talk of my intentions.

Senator Asselin: That was a joint committee.

Senator Tremblay: Now, not wanting to underestimate the "unlike the others" nature of the issue that Senator Hébert was emphasizing in relation with the problems of our young people, the Senate's basic vocation from the beginning was to represent the regions and it has failed to follow it through the years. It has been recognized by all and the committee chaired by Senator Molgat has somehow revived it and put it back in its true perspective. This major function of the Senate expresses itself better in the setting up of a committee reflecting that non-sectorial dimension that is clearly intersectorial at the level of each of the regions. This is a problem fundamental to the exercise of federalism in this country.

When sector-based federal departments extend their activity into the regions, into the very communities, they inevitably meet in the process with the problem of some sort of regional standardization or harmonization; one thinks, for instance, of regions such as the province of Quebec. I believe that the Senate could play its role much more adequately when all these committees will define their sectorial functions, except the managing committees and the general committees of the Senate, and establish a standing committee on regional affairs. Regionalization does not simply mean distribution among the regions, but also, basically, globalization within each region, and this needs special consideration.

On this point, as on the others mentioned by the joint committee in the seventh chapter of its report, I believe that immediate action is possible without waiting for a decision to be made about the more fundamental issue of an elected Senate and the other questions for which we shall have to use the general procedure for constitutional amendments.

This is why, honourable senators, I hope that the Senate, as I said earlier, will itself decide, and this as soon as possible, to initiate the process of its own reform.

Within the next few weeks, in the light of the contributions to the debate which I am sure will follow this one, I intend to move various motions that will allow this house to follow the route the joint committee is suggesting, and express our opinion on each and every reform readily practicable, not strictly in private, as Senator Le Moyne would have wanted it in his comments, but quite to the contrary, in the most visible way possible, to make people aware of that effort. The spectacle of an empty press gallery is always a little disappointing for us senators.

If, by any chance, during that exercise, we manage to agree among ourselves to reform our own institution, let us make it known.

On motion of Senator Leblanc, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATE REFORM

RESPONSE OF GOVERNMENT TO REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Ottawa, K1A 0A2
April 10, 1984

The Honourable Paul Cosgrove,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario
K1A 0A2

Dear Mr. Cosgrove:

In its report to Parliament tabled on January 31, 1984, the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform requested a comprehensive response from the government, in accordance with House of Commons Standing Order 69(13). I am pleased to provide that response.

Before turning to the report, I would like to express, on behalf of the government, my appreciation for the excellent work that you, your fellow co-chairman and the other members of the Committee have accomplished. Your Committee's activities have contributed significantly to greater public awareness of the need for Senate reform and have stimulated wide public debate on the issue. Your decision to travel to the provincial and territorial capitals helped focus attention on the seriousness of your task and enabled Canadians in many parts of the country to come forward and express their views on Senate reform.

I would like to express my special appreciation for the role you played as chairman in helping to obtain a consensus within the Committee on the proposals for Senate reform. In just over six months, your Committee heard many witnesses, studied the options, and reached the conclusions in your report. This would be a most noteworthy achievement in any circumstances. It is all the more impressive since the report is supported by both a bipartisan and a bicameral consensus.

I also wish to commend you and the rest of the Committee for the quality of the report itself, and for your analysis of the reasons and options for Senate reform. Your report provides a thorough yet concise presentation of the issues involved; your recommendations for change stand out clearly within that context. I am aware that others have already praised these qualities in your report, and I can only echo the congratulations you have already received.

The Government of Canada believes the Committee's report contains a useful set of proposals on which a fruitful public debate might be based. I am therefore pleased to inform you that the government intends to use the report as a whole as its working document on Senate reform for future consultations with provincial governments, interested groups and individual Canadians. While various elements of your report will require further study and discussion by this government and others, the government considers that the report as a whole provides an appropriate basis on which consultations might now proceed.

Beyond this general response to your Committee, the government wishes to comment on some of your principal recommendations. First of all, I would like to refer to the report's discussion of how members of the reformed Senate should be selected. After a thoughtful evaluation of the other possible methods of selection, your Committee concluded that only direct election of the Senate would meet the Committee's objectives for Senate reform. I was very interested in the reasoning that led to that decision, and your key conclusion that only an elected Senate can now satisfy the original intent of the Fathers of Confederation.

I think your recommendation for an elected Senate should be understood in relation to your strong recommendation that the reformed Senate's primary role should be regional representation. Your Committee has expressed concern about the tensions our country has experienced in the last decade and about the emergence of regional pressures that, in the words of your report, "have become particularly acute." It is in order to remedy this problem that you have recommended that the second chamber of our national legislature should be employed, as in other federations, for the purpose of regional representation, in order to strengthen the ability of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of people from all regions of the country. The government accepts both your assessment of the problem and your recommendation that the primary role of the Senate should therefore be in the area of regional representation.

The government believes your Committee was correct to conclude that the legitimacy and authority of the Senate are central to our consideration of Senate reform. Your report suggested that the principle of election is best suited to confer upon senators the legitimacy necessary to speak on behalf of their regions and thereby to strengthen the authority of Parliament as a whole. The importance of election for this purpose was endorsed by the testimony of many witnesses before your Committee and by the opinion research available to you. The Government of Canada, for its part, will assess carefully the reactions of provincial governments and individual Canadians to the Committee's endorsement of direct election as it undertakes its own process of consultations.

Although many of the witnesses before your committee who advocated an elected Senate also recommended that it should be based on some form of proportional representation, the Committee has concluded that the reformed Senate should be chosen instead according to the first-past-the-post system now used for the House of Commons. The reasons for your rejection of proportional representation deserve attention, but the government is concerned that in the absence of some provision for proportional representation, your proposal for an elected Senate might well compound the very problem of regional polarization that your report argues Senate reform should help to solve. The government is of the view, therefore, that ongoing discussions of Senate reform should also include further study of the potential advantages and disadvantages of the various electoral systems that might be considered for an elected Senate.

Your report states that in addition to the primary function of regional representation, the Senate should continue to undertake the two complementary functions of investigation and the improvement of legislation. The government concurs with the Committee's view and believes the Senate has a great deal to contribute in these two areas, as its work over the years has clearly shown.

The government is aware that any proposal for Senate reform should take account of what might be the future relation between the Senate and the House of Commons on the one hand, and between the Senate and the government on the other. The government therefore endorses the Committee's recommendations that the reformed Senate should not be able to "undermine Canada's well-tryed system of responsible government" and that the House of Commons should continue to be the "pre-eminent chamber in Parliament". The Government of Canada is of the view that significant reform of the second chamber can enhance the authority of Parliament as a whole to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country, while allowing the guiding principles of our system of responsible parliamentary government to remain firm. Nevertheless, the government believes a great deal more attention must be given to the functioning of a reformed Senate as a integral part of an effective Parliament and, more generally, to its future position within our system of government as a whole. We will also need to give further consideration to the many additional details of Senate reform, a number of which were covered in your report.

Your Committee has concluded, for example, that, "while the less populous provinces merit a stronger voice in Parliament, equal representation in the Senate would tilt the balance too far and would be unacceptable to the vast majority of Canadians, not only to those living in the two largest provinces". Your report's proposed seat distribution represents an interesting compromise that deserves serious consideration. The government agrees with the Committee's suggestion that any revised seat distribution should substantially increase the proportion of seats allotted to Western Canada. The government will particularly welcome provincial governments' reactions to the Committee's proposed seat distribution.

The government appreciates the Committee's interest in ensuring the reformed Senate would be able "to help protect Canada's French-speaking minority". As your report points out, such protection was one of the original purposes of the Senate and was thus an integral part of the agreement that led to Confederation. Your report suggests that a double majority on linguistic matters might be one way of enhancing the Senate's role as the guardian of interests which may sometimes need protection against "actions taken in the name of the majority of the population, as represented by the House of Commons". In the government's view, the Committee's suggestion is an interesting one that should be assessed along with other means for assuring the linguistic and cultural rights and aspirations of French-speaking Canadians.

The Committee has concluded that Senators should not be eligible for appointment to Cabinet. Other proposals for Senate reform have contained divergent views on this matter, and there are reasonable arguments both for and against Senators holding Cabinet office. This is another matter to which the government will be giving careful consideration in the context of intergovernmental and public discussion of Senate reform. The government is concerned about the potential consequences of your proposed nine-year non-renewable term and will wish to bear in mind reaction to that proposal as part of its own consideration of the appropriate tenure for members of the reformed Senate.

Chapter 7 of your report suggests that a nine-year non-renewable term and a suspensive veto procedure could be instituted through amendments that would be within the authority of Parliament under section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The arguments advanced for those two proposed changes deserve examination, but the government notes that earlier in its report the Committee stated that a reformed appointed Senate would not have the mandate to be an effective forum for regional representation. The government will wish to consider whether there is any contradiction between these two recommendations. It will also wish to consider whether some of the short-term reforms suggested might jeopardize fundamental Senate reform. For example, if some provincial governments took the position that their role in implementing Senate reform was being circumscribed by such steps, the process for achieving more fundamental reform might become more complicated and take more time.

In conclusion, I would like to refer to your Committee's efforts at involving provincial governments in your work. As your report points out, under the amending formula a wide measure of provincial agreement will be necessary before significant reform of the Senate can be achieved. By inviting the provincial governments to be a key part of the consultations you have completed, you encouraged them to focus on the important issues at stake and to begin to develop their own positions on Senate reform. That development is one of your Committee's most noteworthy accomplishments, and has helped us make a good beginning on the reform of national institutions. The government firmly intends to build on that beginning through the discussions it will now undertake on the basis of your report. I am very confident that the interest and good will your work has engendered will be carried forward as we advance the debate on Senate reform and move towards its achievement.

Yours sincerely,

P. E. TRUDEAU

REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY
COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-3 TABLED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, I have the honour to table the second report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the committee is reporting on the subject matter of Bill C-3. According to the Orders of the Day, Senator Hébert will move second reading later this day. Since it would be helpful for honourable senators to know what is in the report, I suggest that rather than having the Clerk read it to us, the chairman read it. He may wish to comment as he goes along. This practice was followed by Senator Hayden as Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee in similar circumstances. Dealing with the bill without knowing the views expressed by the committee is not normal.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a very reasonable suggestion. As Senator Flynn has said, Senator Hayden followed this informal practice on reports of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. Although the practice is not strictly according to the rules, it has been useful to us in the past, and we can do anything we want, with leave. The practice is particularly relevant today for the reason expressed by Senator Flynn, that we are going to start second reading debate later this day. I suggest that we grant that leave and ask the Chairman of the Committee to read the report and make any comments he wishes as he goes along.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave I shall read the report and then make some comments on it.

1. This committee was authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of Bill C-3 in the Order of Reference from the Senate of March 20, 1984. The bill had received first and second readings in the House of Commons on December 12, 1983 and January 20, 1984, respectively. At the time the bill was referred to this committee it had been the subject of considerable testimony in the course of its clause-by-clause study by the Standing Committee of Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of the House of Commons.

2. Bill C-3 is entitled "An Act relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof." Its short title is the Canada Health Act. The long title is more appropriate. The bill would consolidate and replace legislation contained in the existing Health Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act. It would change the present law by imposing penalties, as specified in the bill, on provinces which permit extra billing by doctors and user charges for hospital services. It would also allow the federal government, after discussion with the affected provincial governments, to impose penalties on provinces which otherwise did not comply with the five principles of medicare: public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability and accessibility.

3. In fulfilling the terms of its Order of Reference the committee has held eight days of hearings and has heard some 25 witnesses. These witnesses have represented major groups concerned with health care: providers, consumers, policy analysts and governments. With respect to the last group, we were fortunate to have before us the health ministers, or their representatives, of all provinces and the Yukon Territory. The committee has also reviewed the testimony regarding the bill received by the health committee of the House of Commons.

4. Our hearings and submissions have been characterized by a diversity of opinion. Some contend that extra billing and user charges do not constitute a problem. Others strongly support federal legislation to eliminate these practices. Most, if not all, provinces would prefer to deal with the issues themselves without federal legislation.

5. For some, the bill does not go far enough in dealing with problems which they fear will arise from the imposition of penalties. The medical profession, for example, would have the bill ensure their right to binding arbitration once a province has banned extra billing. The provinces claim that this is not a matter for federal legislation, and that the bill, in simply setting out a model for this type of negotiation between doctors and provinces, goes too far.

6. Groups representing interns and residents argue that the bill should protect their right to accessibility—their right to practice within the health care system. Others argue that this, too, is a provincial matter.

7. A number of witnesses have applauded the provision regarding health care practitioners. They feel that this will allow provinces, if they choose, to develop a health care system which is not centred around one type of health care professional, and a narrow view of health care. A number of provinces fear that this will result in an unplanned expansion in comprehensiveness, and that the provisions should not have been introduced without consultation with them.

8. These are just a few examples—and they are far from exhaustive—of the issues which have been debated before us and in many other forums.

9. However, we have also found that witnesses do agree on a number of important points. All believe that Canadians, through their governments, their social institutions and as individuals, must address the issue of developing a comprehensive health care policy, uniform in its standards but suited to the needs of each province. This policy would deal with more fundamental problems than extra-billing and user charges:

- extending present services to patients who suffer from mental disorders, to chronic care patients, and others;
- the more basic issue of broadening and changing the definition of health care to include not only the treatment of illness but care for—attention to—health, through promotion and prevention;
- the issue of how to make the most effective use of all those involved in health care: nurses, dieticians, optometrists, social workers and others, as well as doctors and dentists;
- the problem of regional disparity in the provision of health care;
- the problem of rising costs, and the allocation of costs between the two levels of government.

10. This committee feels that the Senate has an important role to play in this regard. It could provide a forum for all groups to present their ideas, a forum where solutions could begin to be developed.

11. This committee therefore recommends that it be authorized to examine immediately the issues involved in the development of a comprehensive health care policy for Canadians.

All of which, honourable senators, is respectfully submitted.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Now read the report in French.

Senator Bonnell: I cannot do that, but I shall provide you with a copy in French so that you can read it for me.

Honourable senators, let me say that this was a very interesting committee. As I said in the report, we received many views, including those of the provincial ministers of health. One of the things that the ministers agreed to was that, whether or not the Canada Health Bill is passed, they would be prepared to co-operate with a Senate committee in putting together a comprehensive medicare system for Canada. Thereafter, the Senate committee would make recommendations to the Department of National Health and Welfare in favour of a federal-provincial conference. At that conference, the ministers could sit down together with the federal Minister of Health to look at the recommendations of the Senate committee with a view to developing a comprehensive medical care program for all of Canada.

Basically, the Canada Health Bill that we are now looking at takes into consideration the payment of doctors' fees and the payment of hospitalization in an active treatment hospital. However, there are many facets of health care that are not covered under the present health care system such as chronic care, psychiatric care, ambulance fees, optometrist care, chiropractic care and many other things which are really part of the total health package, whether it be preventive or curative. It is these problems that we are recommending should be referred to the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, and not to a special committee; not to a committee which is not involved in health matters but rather to the appropriate standing committee which could sit this summer to examine these issues in detail.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTIETH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, SEOUL, KOREA—
CORRECTION TO NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, on Wednesday April 5, I gave notice that I would draw the attention of the Senate to the Seventieth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Seoul, Korea. While the Debates of the Senate of April 5 at page 424 contains the full text of the Notice of Inquiry, the notice of that inquiry in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate is not complete.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Are you referring to today's edition?

Senator Bosa: Yes, today's edition. I would like to add to that Notice of Motion the following:

—and to the delegation's visit to China and their meetings with the officials of that country.

Therefore, the full text of the inquiry would read as follows:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventieth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Seoul, Korea, 4th to 12th October, 1983 and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada, and to the delegation's visit to China and their meetings with the officials of that country.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question either for the Leader of the Government or for the Deputy Leader, Senator Frith. I am told that the House of Commons is expected to adjourn next Wednesday. I therefore want to ask the Leader or the Deputy Leader what the plans are for the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the plans for this week are clear; as far as next week is concerned, we expect to adjourn on Wednesday evening, so that our proceedings will coincide with those in the other place. We hope to have third reading and Royal Assent of Bill C-3 next week. At least, this is our ambition.

Nothing urgent is expected in the meantime, the only possibility being certain budgetary bills which could come from the other place. However, for the moment, there is no bill that can be sent to us before Easter.

What remains to be determined is when we shall reconvene, that is, whether it will be the week after Easter or the week after that. If this question could be discussed this afternoon, between leaders, we could reach a decision and make an official announcement tomorrow. For the time being, however, there seems to be no pressing reason for us to come back the week after the Easter holiday. We can discuss this further this afternoon and advise the honourable senators tomorrow of any definite plans arrived at.

Senator Flynn: As I understand it, the House will not come back the week after Easter.

Senator Frith: No, that is the Easter holiday.

Senator Flynn: I understand that the Easter holiday is from Holy Thursday until early May. The question therefore is whether we shall come back on May 1 or May 8. This is what I want to ask.

Secondly, if I am right about what the Deputy Leader has said, what is expected from the Senate before the Easter adjournment next Wednesday, if we are to adjourn at the same time as the House of Commons, is that Bill C-3 be given second and third readings and receive Royal Assent.

Senator Frith: To be more specific, as the honourable Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, the Easter holiday according to the calendar arranged for the other place calls for an adjournment from April 18 to Monday, April 30. As far as the Senate is concerned this would mean Tuesday, May 1 as a return date. The question is this: Should we come back on May 1 or May 8? That is exactly what we can settle between ourselves and announce officially tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: I understand that, on May 8, the President of Mexico, Mr. de la Madrid, is expected to address both Houses. I therefore imagine that the Senate cannot return any later.

Senator Frith: True enough, and for this reason, the time of the sitting may be two o'clock in the afternoon instead of eight o'clock in the evening.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

LIBERAL PARTY LEADERSHIP

CABINET SOLIDARITY

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government and deals with the cabinet solidarity issue raised yesterday by my leader.

In view of the fact that a number of leadership candidates seem to have abandoned the principle of cabinet solidarity from the very beginning of the leadership campaign, do the ministers involved in this campaign intend to resign from the Cabinet until the Liberal Party convention has elected a new leader, in order to re-establish in the minds of many Canadians the principle of Cabinet solidarity?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I need hardly remind Senator Asselin that allegations of disruptions in cabinet solidarity do not mean that such disruptions, in fact, existed because—

Senator Asselin: Was there not?

Senator Olson: —the opposition, probably every month and every year since I have been in Parliament—and I first entered in 1957—made the allegation that there was some disagreement between ministers on one point or another. The point is clear that the making of an allegation does not necessarily make it so. That has already been explained a number of times. I know of no disputes with respect to decisions that have been made by cabinet. I know that there are some differences of opinion on what—

Senator Asselin: What do you call differences?

Senator Olson: —prospective policy might or ought to be. I think the Prime Minister explained very clearly that that does not mean that cabinet ministers are disagreeing with decisions that they took collectively. That is where it focuses.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I must say I was amazed to hear my honourable friend's reply, for he is certainly aware of the importance in common law of the cabinet solidarity principle. I was quite amazed also to hear the arguments he used in his efforts to defend these candidates who have demonstrated almost daily, ever since the campaign started, that they have abandoned the principle of cabinet solidarity. They seem to disagree on the statement which Mr. Trudeau has made to the effect that the Canadian government should not compensate Japanese-Canadians who were interned in inland Canada during World War II. They disagree also on the sports pool issue. Again, they disagree with Mr. Turner on the Manitoba issue. Moreover, the minister implied that there had been no breach of cabinet solidarity. In this case, he will have to say that these contenders lack the guts to resign. They prefer to keep their respective portfolios because they are not sure of being elected leader of the Liberal Party.

On the other hand, I feel that the Prime Minister should have the decency to issue some guidelines and demand that they abide by the principle of cabinet solidarity. Nobody will convince me that there has been no breach of cabinet solidarity.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not surprised that Senator Asselin does not agree and I am not surprised that—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We would be worried if he did.

Senator Asselin: And Canadians do not agree.

Senator Olson: —he makes an argument based on an interpretation that he has used for the 16 or 17 years that I have been on this side of the house. He used to make it even when I was on the other side of the house supporting what he said, which was criticism of the government.

Senator Asselin: Sometimes you were on my side?

Senator Olson: Sometimes. So that means I am very familiar with the argument and the attempts to drive wedges, but I am sorry if he does not accept the explanation I gave a few minutes ago—

Senator Asselin: It is not an explanation.

Senator Olson: —because it is just as valid now as it was then, notwithstanding that Senator Asselin does not accept it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is a lot more valid than it was.

NOVA SCOTIA

GLACE BAY—FIRE IN MINE NO. 26

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government regarding the terrible tragedy that took place in Mine No. 26 in Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, resulting in the loss of one miner. Is the leader in a position today to report on that incident and is he able to tell us whether or not they are able to contain the fire resulting from the gas explosion? If he cannot give us a report today, could he do so as soon as possible?

● (1420)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to acknowledge to Senator Muir the deep and heartfelt concern that the government has over that accident. I do not, however, have an update on the situation that is any more current than what is probably already known to Senator Muir, but I can ask the department that is directly responsible and looking into the matter to try to provide us with a more current update. I would go a little further to say that there are also some other matters to be dealt with, on an urgent basis, having to do with the severe economic consequences that will ensue from this terrible accident.

EXPO '86

BRITISH COLUMBIA—LABOUR DISPUTE—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I have a question which I direct to Senator Austin in his capacity as the minister responsible for British Columbia. It is really a follow-up to Senator Buckwold's question of last evening as it relates to Expo '86.

In view of the major concessions made by the building trades to guarantee the on-time completion of the project by undertaking to have a no-strike project and to abandon their long-standing principles by agreeing to work with non-union workers on the job site on the condition that they are paid fair wages; and since it is, as I understand it, federal government policy to pay fair wages on its projects, is the minister prepared to convey, on behalf of the federal government, its support of the policy of fair wages on that project? Such support would guarantee that there would be no interruption due to political reasons in the completion of that job, since all of the economic issues and all of the trade union issues have apparently been resolved.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You should ask that question of Senator Perrault.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Why? Why should he be asked?

Senator Asselin: You stole his place; he is the man responsible for B.C.

Senator Lawson: I directed my question to Senator Austin.

Senator Austin: The question that Senator Lawson has asked is even now the subject of discussion between the provincial government and the building trade unions led by Mr. Roy Gauthier. I have kept those discussions very much in—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Secret.

Senator Austin: —view; I have chatted with the parties involved from time to time and they have called me.

It is the collective view of those parties, as it is of the federal government, that no advantage would accrue to those discussions were the federal government to make any statements with respect to a labour relations issue in the province of British Columbia, which is wholly a responsibility under provincial jurisdiction. Accordingly, I have no statement to make.

I do want to say, however, that I trust that the continuing process will result in agreement between the Expo '86 Corporation, which is a provincial crown corporation, and the unions affected.

Senator Lawson: As a supplementary, I do not accept that there is no federal responsibility or that the matter is exclusively within the provincial jurisdiction, because a part of that

World's Fair is a convention centre which is being built under federal jurisdiction. If Expo '86 should be cancelled for political reasons it would not simply reflect on Vancouver, British Columbia; it will reflect on the country as a whole and certainly on the federal government in terms of its responsibilities. I would not want the federal government to duck the issue by avoiding its responsibilities—

Senator Flynn: It never does.

Senator Lawson:—and not taking a particularly strong stand on a vital issue that may mean the saving of the project.

There may be reasons that we are not aware of which are political—which are not trade union issues but may be due to economic or other factors—which could result in the cancelling of this project. I think that the federal government could play an important national role by making clear a policy position consistent with what it is already doing and by avoiding any delays so that we can get on with a very important project, not only for British Columbia but for Canada as a whole.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Lawson that the project is an important one for Canada as well as for British Columbia. It is because of its significance to Canada that we are following the policy of allowing the question of union and non-union people working side by side and the question of what is an appropriate rate for labour on that site to be matters of an effective negotiation between a provincial crown corporation and the unions which are involved. It is because we are exercising our responsibility that we are not allowing ourselves to be brought into that debate to weight the arguments. Our coming into the debate at this stage would not, in the opinion of all of the parties, help the "collective bargaining process," if I might put the phrase in quotation marks.

I would say to Senator Lawson that the federal government's site at Canada Place on the Inner Harbour has been fully contracted. Union contractors have all of the basic construction work, and therefore we do not have the same problems as those experienced at the False Creek site, which is the responsibility of the provincial government.

The discussions are ongoing. Indeed, an expectation has been created in British Columbia as a result of the premier's statement that some decision might be made by the provincial cabinet today. In the circumstances, the honourable senator will recognize that by not making a statement we are not addressing the principal policy questions that are part of the labour dynamic, but we are trying to assist the parties in coming to a conclusion on their responsibilities.

Hon. Martial Asselin: We want Perrault!

CANADA HEALTH BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jacques Hébert moved the second reading of Bill C-3, relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services provided under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Like all of you, honourable senators, I sometimes have an opportunity to travel abroad, often in beautiful countries with incomparable climate, in countries which may indeed be richer than ours because of their culture and their civilization.

Every time I wonder why I have such deep feelings for Canada. Every time I can appreciate that there are very many reasons—and I will give them to you on some other occasion!

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Hear, hear!

Senator Hébert: Today, I will give you only one. As you may have guessed, it is our health insurance system, second to none the world over.

It is the ever undeniable proof that we Canadians are fully aware of our priorities and that we are deeply concerned about the fate of those who are suffering, however destitute they may be.

It is therefore with great pleasure that I open the debate today on Bill C-3, the Canada Health Act.

I must confess that I find myself in the privileged position of being godfather to a newborn whose birth and first few months have given rise to much interest among the public, because they were the answer to the concerns and general expectations of Canadians.

This bill has been scrutinized by every group interested in its purpose. Untold precautions have been taken so that it would meet the expectations of the majority of its supporters; I would even say, to some extent, of its detractors—for there were a few!

I fully endorse its objectives and I am convinced that it will fulfill its mission.

At the outset, I should like to emphasize that the main purpose of this piece of legislation is to consolidate the underlying principles and the basis of Canada's health insurance system, more generally called medicare. It enshrines the criterion of accessibility to medical and hospital care regardless of the financial status of the patient.

As a result of the erosion of that principle through user charges and extra-billing by physicians in many regions of the country, the Government of Canada has been forced to step in.

This phenomenon has been growing worse in the past five years. The foundations of our health insurance structure were being undermined. Though quite reasonable a few years ago, extra-billing and user fees cost patients close to $150 million last year. Time had come to strengthen this national program, the better to meet tomorrow's problems. With as much dynamism, we will have to come to grips with the needs of our aging population and the explosion of new health technologies.

In this context of scientific evolution unparalleled in world events, we know now that the new approach will reflect the concepts of preventive medicine and health promotion. Our health practitioners will have to steer towards that goal while keeping in mind that this new approach might cast some doubt on past procedures.

However, before looking to the future, it was imperative to fill the gaps in our basic health system.

• (1430)

[English]

The issues of direct charges, user fees and extra billing, which now threaten to erode our health care system, have been actively discussed in public forums since 1979 when these charges increasingly became the subject of concern to individuals, groups and health professionals. Seldom has an issue been the subject of so much public scrutiny and debate. Mr. Justice Emmett Hall's Commission in 1979 and 1980 held public hearings in 13 Canadian cities as well as additional hearings with governments and other bodies. Altogether, some 450 submissions were received. In 1981, the Parliamentary Task Force on Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements held public hearings throughout Canada with representations from organizations, experts and individual witnesses. In the last three years there have been three federal-provincial health ministers' meetings, three federal-provincial deputy ministers' meetings, numerous meetings between officials and numerous bilateral meetings between the federal and provincial health ministers. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has made a major effort to bring the issues before the Canadian public for dialogue, discussion and debate. Since she has met and spoken to numerous groups and individuals across the country, she has also received and responded to thousands of letters containing comments and suggestions concerning medicare and the Canada Health Act.

In July 1983 the federal government issued a position paper preserving universal medicare which clarified the federal position on direct charges. Over 300,000 copies of this document have been distributed to the public, health practitioners and other interested parties. To enhance public awareness, understanding and discussion of health insurance issues, funds were made available to help non-profit public interest organizations defray some of the costs of conducting over 100 public meetings. I cite these facts to you to convey the nature of the efforts made to bring these issues before Canadians. They assure me that Canadians have views on the issues and that these views have been accurately heard.

[Translation]

Medicare has had a long and honourable history in Canada. Our system is one of the most equitable in the world. It is economically viable, it is humane, and, in a way, it is part of our heritage. It is based on the principle that every single Canadian is entitled to whatever hospital and medical care he needs, regardless of his ability to pay.

Thanks to medicare, no one need worry about any financial burden resulting from an unforeseen illness. Since health insurance is a collective program, all Canadians share the cost of medical care for which they could not pay individually.

[Senator Hébert.]

Their taxes provide anticipated payments towards the cost of the insured health services they will eventually need. This program is not only for the young, the wealthy and the healthy. It is designed also to help the poor, the old and the chronically ill.

The latter group is the one most affected by the charging of direct fees.

Physicians paid with public funds under the medicare program require their patients to pay additional fees over and above the provincial fee schedules. This is called extra-billing. In some provinces, hospitals charge additional fees for each day of hospital care or for emergency services. These are called user fees.

It seems to me that, once you have paid your income tax, and even the premiums that are required in some provinces, it is unacceptable that you should have to pay an additional amount when you are ill.

Several reasons have been mentioned to justify the fact that users of medicare are being billed direct fees.

The first is that such a practice will prevent abuse and will discourage those insured from visiting their doctor for no reason whatsoever or from calling at the emergency service of hospitals unless they do have serious problems. Yet, detailed studies have shown that this is not true. Most visits to the doctor's office are initiated by the doctor himself and he is the one who decides whether his patient should be hospitalized or not. No one is admitted to hospital without a request from the treating physician. Concerning visits to the emergency service, the only people whom user fees will stop from going are the most disadvantaged, the unemployed, for instance, and all those people who need help the most when they are ill.

The second reason mentioned for having users pay certain fees is that this is a resource needed to balance budgets. However, the income represented by these charges is so minimal when compared to the operating costs of hospitals that this argument does not hold water.

Other methods must be used to make the public aware of the costs of hospital care. One method which has shown its effectiveness is to deliver to each patient a statement of account listing the costs of services, but only for his or her information. Regarding extra-billing by doctors, which in any case is practised only by a minority, it should not exist since most doctors are satisfied with the agreement binding their professional associations and the provincial health insurance plan.

[English]

The original Bill C-3, as presented to the House of Commons on December 12, 1983, was amended in the course of study by the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. Over the course of eight weeks, the committee carefully examined every aspect of the bill. Representatives from health provider organizations, consumer groups, health experts and almost all provincial governments testified before the committee. Some 39 amendments were suggested and approved to improve the bill. While many of these were of a technical nature, others were quite significant in terms of responding to concerns expressed by the provinces, by providers and by consumers.

Honourable senators, I would like to summarize briefly the main features of the proposed Canada Health Act. Essentially, it replaces two existing acts, the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, 1957, and the Medical Care Act, 1966. The proposed new act sets out as clearly as possible the program criteria and conditions of payment which the provinces must meet in order to be eligible for federal contributions to health care.

The intention is that basic health services be insured for all residents. The basic health services covered by the legislation are all necessary hospital services, physician services and surgical-dental services performed in a hospital. The criteria which provinces must meet to be eligible for the full federal cash contribution are:

1. Public administration: The health insurance program must be administered by a public authority which is accountable to the provincial government.
2. Comprehensiveness: The program must cover all basic health services; that is, necessary hospital and medical services, and surgical-dental services rendered in a hospital.
3. Universality: 100 per cent of residents must be entitled to insured health services.
4. Portability: Insured health services must be available to Canadians temporarily out of their province of residence.

● (1440)

5. Accessibility: All residents must have reasonable access to insured health services without financial or other obstacles.

Physicians must receive reasonable compensation, and hospitals must be paid for providing insured health services.

In addition, the provinces must supply reasonable information to the minister and must give recognition to the federal contributions in their public documents and publicity.

I wish to emphasize that the basic broad principles which I have outlined are essentially the same as those contained in the existing two pieces of legislation.

[Translation]

However, what is new in this bill are the provisions dealing with user fees and extra-billing by physicians. Until now, the federal government has always considered such practices as inconsistent with the basic principles of medicare. However, there is nothing specific about this in existing legislation.

Bill C-3 clearly states that such practices are inconsistent with the principle of medicare and it provides that the federal contribution will be reduced in proportion to the amounts charged to patients through user fees and extra-billing.

The new bill allows the federal government to take into consideration the seriousness of the failure to meet the conditions for cash contributions or payment of the full amount provided in the 1977 act when reducing or withholding contributions. The existing legislation is much too strict in that respect, because the only alternative for the federal government was to say nothing and withhold its full contribution. You will agree that it was a much too high-handed practice and that it was almost unthinkable to use it considering its devastating effect on the health system in the province concerned. It was like an atomic bomb. Hereafter, it will be possible to levy a more realistic and reasonable penalty when a province does not comply with one of the criteria of the scheme.

Bill C-3 also provides adequate mechanisms for consultation with the provinces in cases of alleged default.

As you can see, the bill has a rather limited purpose. It is neither expansionist nor interventionist and it respects provincial jurisdiction on individual health care. It merely consolidates the basic principles of the existing legislation, provides penalties against those provinces that allow user fees or extra-billing and makes the government's discretion as far as penalties are concerned more flexible.

As I said, Bill C-3 does not encroach on provincial jurisdiction in the health area. It contains in the preamble a paragraph clearly stating that the rights of the provinces under the Constitution Act, 1967 are in no way affected.

The bill does not impose additional burdens on the provinces. It affects only services already provided under the existing legislation.

It does not dictate to the provinces how they should plan, organize and administer their health systems. The provinces remain free to develop their own versions of Medicare according to their priorities.

There are many health practitioners who fear that this bill will limit their professional freedom, establish state-run health services, and transform their profession into a bureaucracy by making them salaried workers. Their fears are unfounded. Practitioners did not lose any of their privileges in 1968 when Medicare was implemented. Medicare does not limit in any way the patient's right to choose his or her doctor, nor does it limit the doctor's right to choose his or her patients. The bill does not provide any change in the way physicians are being paid. By the way, it should be emphasized that physicians have been fully protected against bad debts ever since the implementation of Medicare.

Bill C-3 does not reflect all the proposals put forward by several groups eager to extend the scope of the current legislation. It is clear that one of these days we shall have to look into the increasing needs of an aging population, new technologies, community services, preventive medicine and fitness. But we had first of all to set the principles of Medicare on very firm grounds.

The federal government has committed itself to proceed to the next stages in co-operation with the provincial governments, health professionals and consumer groups.

[English]

In conclusion, I would like to say that I am very proud to sponsor this piece of legislation before the Senate. I am convinced that we will be taking an historical step in the evolution of our medicare program in Canada. The debate on these issues has been going on for five years. We have heard from all interested parties—the time is ripe for action.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not mind congratulating the sponsor of the bill, Senator Hébert, who by the way, always puts things so well. However, in spite of my admiration for his elegant style, I cannot congratulate him for his independence. He always pretends to be very objective but I have rarely heard so orthodox a speech, accepting fully and without hesitation the party line, the Liberal propaganda as expressed by Miss Bégin.

I do not know whether he himself drafted the speech, but I noticed that he first wanted to centre the debate around some aspects of the bill that usually arouse public support, that is, hospital user charges and extra billing. These were the big problems the bill was supposed to resolve.

Then he spoke of other things. But he completely forgot—as a matter of fact, he did not, he just totally distorted the facts when he said that this bill was the result of a long consultation process.

Even Miss Bégin admitted in the other place that she had not fully consulted with the provinces at the drafting stage of this legislation.

User charges are a straw man that the Liberal government is using in order to set up, through the provisions of this bill, an administrative straitjacket that will affect the provinces in an area which is primarily if not exclusively of provincial jurisdiction.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Get to the real reason.

Senator Flynn: The real reason is that. I know my good friend Senator Olson is just like Madame Bégin—very disappointed that the House of Commons did not bite at the fly that she was throwing with the surcharge and user fees. She was only trying to create an election issue. The government has been trying to create such an issue since last year when it saw that its popularity in the polls was falling down to the point where it really belongs after the type of administration, false promises and lies which it has used since it came back into power, or even before then, in 1980.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Once a sore loser, always a sore loser.

Senator Flynn: I am not a sore loser. I would not like to be in your place, Senator Frith. I would not like to be as you are, having to follow orders blindly; to have that blind faith in their judgment that was typified by Senator Hébert's remarks. I was surprised at him, because it does not fit his personality, and I am sure that on reflection he might want to make a more objective speech when he closes the debate. I would invite him to recognize that there are some problems. I would like him to recognize that at least the committee that looked into the subject matter of the bill found some problems.

[Senator Hébert.]

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): When you were on this side of the house, you were always against your government.

Senator Flynn: There was no time for me to do so; otherwise, I would probably have opposed it. If I had had as much time as you do, I can assure you that at times I would have opposed the government. As for you, even though the government were forever in power, you would always be sure of being right, infallible, topflight, immutable.

Senator Frith: Right on!

Senator Flynn: I cannot take much credit, it is so obvious. I am not angry at all but I call upon Senator Hébert and his orthodox colleagues to try to understand the report. It seems to have been prepared by a committee chaired by a medical doctor who happens to be from Prince Edward Island and who has also been a minister of health in his province. I even think that he boasted, and rightly so, of being a minister when medicare was introduced in his province. This committee, controlled by Liberals—one of its most famous members was Senator Bosa—paid special attention to the findings contained in this report; I will deal with it later on.

It is really interesting, but let us see what this report says. In paragraph 2, it reads:

It would change the present law by imposing penalties, as specified in the bill, on provinces which permit extra billing by doctors and user charges for hospital services.

Senator Hébert mentioned that. To him, this is the main purpose of the legislation. The report goes on:

It would also allow the federal government, after discussion with the affected provincial governments, to impose penalties on provinces which otherwise did not comply with the five principles of medicare: public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability and accessibility.

Senator Hébert has not referred to penalties in other areas than user charges or extra billing. They are nevertheless provided for because the committee, at least, underlined this point.

Second, in paragraph 3, we read that the committee has heard several witnesses and that:

With respect to the last group . . .

Namely the governments, we were fortunate to have before us the health ministers, or their representatives, of all provinces and the Yukon Territory. The committee has also reviewed the testimony regarding the bill received by the health committee of the House of Commons.

Even though it is not specified in the report, it is a very important and unique event for a Senate committee to have the representatives of all provinces appear before it. It is important, but Senator Hébert did not mention it; to him, it was not important, he only cared about user charges. The fact that the representatives of all provinces have appeared before the Senate committee to oppose this legislation is not even worth mentioning by the sponsor of this bill. It is as if nothing had been said before the Senate.

Third, the witnesses who have been heard have expressed divergent opinions on this matter. There was no difference though in Senator Hébert's praises of the Government's purpose or the wording of the bill.

According to some people, extra billing and user charges are not a problem. Incidentally, it was not a major problem in the opinion of Mr. Castonguay, former minister of health under the Bourassa or Lesage government, I do not remember, but I think it was Bourassa. He said that this represents a very small part of the overall cost of medicare. Anyway, the Province of Quebec has no such practice. If it did, it would be of no importance; when it does exist, it is relatively not important.

Senator Hébert said the practice is becoming more and more common and will increase, which is terrible. Of course, it will increase; some would like to make a big issue out of it during the next election campaign no doubt. It is important a priori; it is traditional, as I find that out, even from Senator Hébert.

Others strongly support the federal government's efforts to put an end to these practices, in particular those who support it in this house as well as in the other place.

Most of the provinces, if not all, would prefer to settle the problem themselves, without federal legislation. Not only would they like to settle that matter but all the problems raised by this bill as well. Once again, with all due respect to Senator Hébert, the problem of extra-billing and user charges is only one aspect of the issue. The minister selected it so that her officials would understand that they had to use strawmen so as to better infringe upon a provincial jurisdiction.

Another problem considered in the committee report, paragraph 5, is for example the arbitration concept. Doctors wish to have their right to binding arbitration recognized in the bill, if ever the provinces introduce extra-billing.

The legislation does not recognize that right, I must admit; it only suggests that these doctors should try and get a binding arbitration clause in their agreements with the provinces. What business has the Government of Canada to bother suggesting that an agreement between a province and its doctors should or had better contain that binding arbitration clause? Why should we get involved? We are not party to these contracts and should not be. Furthermore, as would probably say our Speaker who himself is an eminent lawyer, the federal government is not even concerned.

That is a problem Senator Hébert did not bother with. According to him, provincial jurisdiction regarding medicare is not in the least affected. He says so because the bill says so, as well as Miss Bégin, and he believed her. He has repeated it like all those who have maintained it in the other place.

Let us come now to paragraph 7. It says that certain provinces fear that this will result in an unplanned expansion in comprehensiveness and that these provisions should not have been introduced without consultation with them. I said earlier that the sponsor claimed that there had been consultations; the committee for its part says: "without consultation". It does not say that there was a mistake in that regard. I mentioned earlier that Miss Bégin had admitted to some consultation, but not with those directly concerned, namely the provinces and health ministers.

I draw your attention to paragraph 3 of the report, which I will quote in its entirety.

However, we have also found that witnesses do agree on a number of important points. All believe that Canadians, through their governments, their social institutions and as individuals, must address the issue of developing a comprehensive health care policy, uniform in its standards but suited to the needs of each province.

That is what we now have.

This policy would deal with more fundamental problems—

Once again I draw this to Senator Hébert's attention.

—than extra-billing and user charges:

Senator Frith: What paragraph is this?

Senator Flynn: It is paragraph 9, at the bottom of page 2. The Committee says those are more fundamental problems than extra-billing and user charges. According to the sponsor of this Bill, extra-billing and user charges are the only issues before us, with which we should come to grips most vigorously.

I now come to paragraph 10, about which Senator Hébert did not say anything either:

This committee feels that the Senate has an important role to play in this regard. It could provide a forum for all groups to present their ideas, a forum where solutions could begin to be developed.

Do we need solutions? I did not hear anything in Senator Hébert's speech about solutions other than the swift and docile passing of Bill C-3. According to him, this solves everything. The Committee believes that the Senate has a role to play and that there are solutions to find.

Besides, this idea comes from Senator Bosa. He told us the Senate had a role to play, that there was a problem. Senator Bosa did not tell us that Bill C-3 was the cure-all.

He told us that the Senate must deal with these issues. This is a difficult and complex matter; many problems remain to be solved and the Senate must deal with them. He did not suggest that Bill C-3 would settle the matter, not at all. Far from it, the conclusion to this report adds the following:

This committee therefore recommends that it be authorized to examine immediately the issues involved in the development of a comprehensive health care policy for Canadians.

We therefore do not have any comprehensive health care policy. Bill C-3 does not establish such a policy and it leaves a lot of problems unsolved.

You should try and reconcile the image which springs out of this report with that suggested by the sponsor of the Bill. If you succeed, it will be most interesting to see how you can stretch the text to meet the considerations contained in the report.

I now come to the question which I consider the most important, namely, the unanimous opposition of the Provinces and the provincial health ministers to this Bill. Senator Hébert never mentioned it. If the federal Government said that it was right even though the ten Provinces disagreed, they cannot be right! The federal Government alone is always right, especially the Liberal Government and even more so the Trudeau Government. I do not know whether the same could be said about a Government led by someone other than Mr. Trudeau. The infallibility aspect may be somewhat diminished in the beginning, a bit less assured, but it will certainly come if we have the misfortune—

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault: It is likely.

Senator Flynn: It is likely. However, do not forget that it was very likely in your case, Senator Thériault, when you were in New Brunswick. You were defeated some time ago and you are not about to return to power. When the change comes, it could be for quite a while.

I come back to the health ministers' submission. I ask the senators to examine the opinions they voiced. I do not know whether I should recite the whole thing. It might not be fair, either for you or for me.

One thing is sure, namely that all the ministers—the one from Manitoba was not there last week, but I understand that he had already appeared—

Senator Thériault: Those who are against the Bill are all Conservative ministers.

Senator Flynn: Senator Thériault, why do we not have more Liberal provincial governments?

Senator Thériault: They put all the blame for their problems on the federal government.

Senator Flynn: In that case, it will not be long before the federal Liberal government is ousted.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: There are at least two that are not Conservative.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Even three, Senator Thériault.

Senator Flynn: I find this amusing; I just love Senator Thériault's interjections.

Senator Asselin: He cannot count.

Senator Flynn: He always shows a very special feeling which I perceive as well among Quebec and Acadian Liberals—it is typical, as I said to Senator Frith a while ago—an assurance of superiority and infallibility. For you, liberalism is a religion.

Senator Thériault: It is a matter of experience.

Senator Flynn: No doubt the experience of superiority and domination.

[Senator Flynn.]

Mr. David Russell, the Alberta Minister of Health was the first one to speak—

Senator Thériault: Say nothing about it.

Senator Flynn: Were you there?

Senator Thériault: Yes, I read it all.

Senator Flynn: Well, you read it all. I will read it for Senator Hébert because apparently he did not hear him, even if he was there.

Mr. David Russell said the following:

● (1500)

[English]

To put it very bluntly, we are concerned about the lack of consultation, looking over the three-year history of this bill.

[Translation]

It is an excerpt. On page 10, Mr. Sheehy from Nova Scotia says:

[English]

There has been a great deal of confusion, uncertainty and controversy surrounding this bill. In my opinion, this has been precipitated by the lack of co-operative dialogue between the federal government and the provinces, an all-too-frequent occurrence in recent years. I believe the time has long since passed for a return to federal-provincial co-operation, rather than confrontation.

[Translation]

Mr. Sheehy adds further on:

[English]

I firmly maintain that there is no health care crisis in the province of Nova Scotia, and I seriously question the need for a Canada health act at this time.

[Translation]

Now further than that, for the information of those who are of the same orthodoxy as the sponsor of the bill, Mr. Keith Norton from Ontario had this to say on the amendment brought forward:

● (1510)

[English]

When advised about this amendment,—

[Translation]

I believe it is the amendment to clause 12.

[English]

—I immediately communicated with the federal Minister of Health and advised her in the strongest possible terms that this amendment represented a gross intrusion into the jurisdiction of the provinces into the administration of health care and in the way in which it would relate to the medical profession within the province.

[Translation]

That is the first comment. The others are in keeping with it. I would like now to quote Mr. Johnson from Quebec, delegate minister for Canadian Intergovernmental Affairs and past health minister.

We had then said that we found Bill C-3 were unacceptable first because it did away with consensus system in application until then with all practical consequences mentioned particularly by some of my colleagues at this table.

They do not talk here about user charges or extra billing but consensus system.

Secondly, the federal government is using its spending power in such a way and with such conditions that it becomes more or less a power to induce provinces to spend more money.

So it is a spending power which is used to induce provinces to spend more money. Mr. Castonguay, the previous minister, has expressed the same idea. Yesterday, in the Quebec Legislature, the Official Opposition, the Liberal Party, said that it would support the objections of the Quebec government. Then it is not good enough to say that this is the opinion of the PQ government as it comes from the Quebec National Assembly. I remember that Mr. Trudeau would always dismiss the arguments of the Quebec government as péquist, whether they were sound or not. I shall now deal with Mr. Johnson's statement.

Through this Bill C-3, the Federal government takes it upon itself to unilaterally determine provincial responsibilities and costs by introducing in this legislation a contractual approach for hospital insurance and financial penalties for the non-observance of those provisions.

You can see that user fees and extra billing are not the only issues at stake. Then Mr. Johnson went on to say:

Not only the Federal government would not have to take charge of its share of the additional costs generated by this bill, but it could reduce its contribution even further if he decided to take the side of the lobby against provincial governments.

And I quote from the next page:

The hospital insurance plan would no longer be based on consensus. The Federal legislation, would from now on determine the transferability terms of user fees and would require the province of Quebec to provide and finance all the services listed in the legislation. The regulatory power of the Federal government only provides that it cannot exclude any insured service without the agreement of the provinces.

The provinces cannot add any service.

On the contrary the Federal government should be able to impose the coverage of certain services without the agreement of the provinces.

I tried to explain that the problem is much more serious. The sponsor of the bill did not mention it. User fees and extra billing are not the only issues at stake. To conclude, I will quote again Mr. Castonguay to underline that this is a unanimous opinion rather than the views of the PQ government.

I believe that until now our health care system has been quite good. We have a negotiation based system in which each party is free to make commitments according to its means.

And he adds a little further:

[English]

It seems to me that the bill introduces a whole new approach. The system whereby the federal government entered into agreements with the provinces is being replaced by a much more rigid system, under which a list of compulsory services is established, and if a province, for reasons that could be valid, is not able to provide all of those services, then there could be some penalties imposed.

[Translation]

Mr. Castonguay mentioned the punitive nature of this legislation several times. I shall quote the last paragraph of his statement or rather the next to last, as the last one is for acknowledgments.

[English]

Finally, it seems to me that the provinces have applied their program in a fairly efficient way. I do not believe that any province has really tried to limit access to medical care, and I do not believe that they deserve a bill such as this, which will penalize them if they do not do exactly what is being prescribed in the legislation.

● (1520)

[Translation]

I suppose that should be enough to prove that there really is a problem. We have witnessed a unique situation when all the provinces appeared before us begging us to stop this bill, to find other solutions because, after all, being under their own jurisdiction this was bound to create problems. Moreover, there was a danger of putting in jeopardy a system which, up to now, has worked well. They wanted the Senate to do something, if only to justify its existence. If our role is really regional, when there is agreement among all the provinces, it seems to me that we must listen and give them a chance to explain their points of view adequately and efficiently. That is why I suggest that asking us to pass this bill at this time is an attempt at making the Senate look ridiculous. At a time when we are talking about Senate reform, when we are trying to emphasize our role as a second chamber, and to reaffirm our responsibilities to the regions whose opinions I believe cannot be expressed by anyone but the provinces, then there is simply no other way. Anyhow, the Atlantic region was here, as well as the Quebec region, the Ontario region, the Western region. The whole West was here.

If we cannot listen to the unanimous grievances of the provinces, we know what to make of what is currently said about the fact that the Senate has never been able to represent the regions and to properly carry out its duties in this regard.

On the other hand we have a very special opportunity to improve our image and to compensate for our past inaction by saying that we are going to rise, thus allowing Miss Bégin or the Federal Government to meet with all the provinces. She has already met with them on a one-to-one basis. Perhaps she was applying the principle that you must divide to conquer. Anyway, she should now meet them all and say, "Look, can we come to an agreement?"

Before the committee, Ministers have said time and again they believed that a new meeting with the Minister could possibly, and even probably, lead to solutions in some cases.

What if the Senate were to tell Miss Bégin that we will wait. We are not seeking confrontation. We will not "flex our muscles", as Senator Bosa would say. We merely want to give Miss Bégin, the opportunity to meet with her provincial counterparts. Failing that, of course, then we could flex our muscles. But in the meantime, I propose as a solution to delay the vote on the Bill until June 1. Why June? Because Miss Bégin did say that this bill was not that urgent, that it could wait until the beginning of June.

Also, a clause of the Bill allows for retroactivity to April 1 of this year. Hence, there is no harm in delaying. We will adjourn for Easter. We could meditate during Easter, reconsider the matter and give Miss Bégin the opportunity to do likewise and Easter could mark the resurrection of co-operation, of goodwill between the provinces. A meeting could be held and perhaps a solution could be reached. Thus the Senate would have succeeded and achieved an exceptional feat. The Senate would have reasserted its role, the Senate would finally be able to take pride in having played the role which the Fathers of Confederation assigned to us in 1867 but which we have not fulfilled until now.

Accordingly, I move, seconded by Senator Roblin:

That further consideration of this bill be delayed until June 1, 1984, in order to enable the Federal Minister of Health to meet collectively with her Provincial and Territorial counterparts with a view to resolving their differences.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on Bill C-3. Since I believe the amendment put forward by Senator Flynn would have the effect of a one year's hoist—

Senator Flynn: No, not one year but six months.

Senator Thériault: Even that is too long.

Concerning the implementation of this bill, my remarks will focus as much on the amendment as on the bill itself.

Firstly, I am happy to offer sincere congratulations to my colleague Senator Hébert for his excellent and quite pertinent speech explaining the reasons for this bill.

Being a supporter of the Liberal Party, I did not notice any partisanship in the remarks made by my colleague Senator Hébert. Indeed, at one point I thought I was listening to a truly independent-minded person. He was speaking as a person who, as we all know, is deeply concerned with the wellbeing of his fellow Canadians.

[Senator Flynn.]

In fact, I was not surprised to hear the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate admonishing Senator Hébert for his partisanship and then delivering a speech which had nothing to do with the policy of his party. Come on! If you want to reproach somebody for being too partisan, you should at least be logical.

Honourable senators, as a former provincial Minister of Health, as a person who took part in the discussions that were held in 1966, 1967 and 1968, when listening to Senator Flynn this afternoon, I thought I was hearing all over again all the arguments put forward by the Conservatives who were saying: We do not want medicare because it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. Ontario was saying: We do not want medicare because we do not have the means to finance it. Alberta was saying: We do not want it, we do not want medicare because we do not have the money to fund such a program and because it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction.

Honourable senators, if we had listened to . . . I do not think that Senator Flynn was a member of the government at the time, and like all other Conservative members in the opposition, I suppose that he was protesting, although I never heard him do so, not being myself in the House of Commons. The Conservatives were saying: We do not want that, we cannot, we do not need that, we do not want it now but later, in six months—or in six weeks this time. The Canadian people heard these arguments in 1966, 1967 and 1968. There were even provincial premiers, some of them leading Liberal governments, who were putting forward the same arguments, and we wonder why. It is clearly because when one is the head of a government, one does not want to set up programs which are going to cost money and force one to levy new taxes. It is as simple as that. Such is the case with Liberal governments. You can imagine the situation when we have to deal with Conservative governments.

People are always satisfied with the status quo. Affluent people do not need medicare. What matters is not the arguments, but the demonstrated facts, and reasons for postponement are plenty. This time, it is six weeks.

I ask Senator Flynn what could be done in six weeks. I even heard the Leader of the Opposition say: Give the provincial health ministers a chance to organize and meet their federal counterpart.

● (1530)

Moreover, honourable senators, we are all aware that this is not the first time that we have dealt with the subject matter of Bill C-3. We started talking about it before the 1979 election and we have never stopped since. As a matter of fact, what is it we are really trying to do with Bill C-3? We really want to stop the extra billing practised by physicians as well as the hospital user charge policy of a number of provinces. Let us have a look at what is really going on.

It is not the "have not" provinces which have initiated these additional costs. It is not New Brunswick—they refer to a Conservative government—it is true that it was one who started imposing them. It started to impose user charges, I believe, either in 1977 or 1978, for one year, and in 1979 it removed them before the 1980 election. Once re-elected, it re-established them.

New Brunswick is an exception. It was not Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island or Quebec, but the "have" provinces which initiated these additional charges. Why? Do we wonder why? It is because the government heading these provinces are Conservative governments whose political philosophy is not to support or share or provide the same good care and services both to the poor and the rich. That was their philosophy 50 years ago. That was their philosophy again 20 years ago, and that is again their philosophy today, judging from the remarks made by Senator Flynn.

Senator Asselin: What about the Quebec Liberal Party?

Senator Thériault: The Quebec Liberal Party . . . if you give me just a minute or two, I shall come back to that. In Quebec, it is an historical fact that whatever legislation the federal government may adopt, no matter its political colour, the provincial government will be against it, especially when it might affect its jurisdiction. Which does not mean that Quebecers never discuss anything, as Senator Flynn has implied, for provincial governments are jealous of their jurisdiction. Which does not necessarily mean that this is the view of most Quebecers—

Senator Asselin: That is democracy.

Senator Thériault: Well, does democracy in Quebec exist only at the provincial level; does it work only for the people who have elected 75 Liberals to Ottawa?

Senator Flynn: This never came up in the last election.

Senator Thériault: This never comes up at election time. Never has a Quebec government fought an election on—

Senator Frith: That is blackmail.

Senator Thériault: You are the ones blackmailing. The Conservatives are the ones blackmailing.

Moreover, honourable senators, if the Senate is really to represent the regions, then the New Brunswick people I am representing here are against it. As we know, every poll indicates that Canadians are totally opposed to extra-billing. So, as senators, is it our duty to represent the provincial governments which appeared before our committee, or is it our duty to represent the people in our regions?

Senator Flynn: The matter of user fees did not come up.

Senator Thériault: But what else are we talking about? Honourable senators, do we have to oppose Bill C-3 because it does not solve every health care problem? It does not create any either. You are the ones who are raising negative ideological problems, and you are against this legislation because it comes from a federal Liberal government. That's all. That's the only reason.

Once again I suggest to my colleagues in the Senate that I know, for I have already thought about it, that a large number of the health ministers who appeared before the committee are happy with Bill C-3. Moreover, they too do not want that extra-billing by physicians; but they lack the political courage to oppose it, and they want the federal government to know it. That's the truth.

As for me, honourable senators, if I had a criticism about Bill C-3, I would say that it does not go far enough. It should address not only user fees but also the problem of provincial governments charging a premium for health care services. And Bill C-3, in my opinion, should state, in spite of the provinces, that they will have to find other ways to make taxpayers pay to cover health costs, apart from premiums; and this again come from the Conservatives because this is what happens in the provinces lead by a Conservative government.

Can you tell me, Senator Flynn, that there is justice in a province like Ontario or Alberta when a person earning $75,000 or $1,000,000 pays the same health care premium as the one earning $15 or $20,000? Is that justice?

Once again, there is no such thing in Quebec. There is no such thing either in the Atlantic provinces. Taxes are charged—

Senator Flynn: What about income tax?

Senator Thériault: Yes, income tax.

Senator Flynn: Everybody has to pay it.

Senator Thériault: The insurance companies, honourable senators, but there is a difference, for insurance companies are profit-making institutions whereas governments were created by the people, for the people, and not to make profits.

Senator Asselin: With a deficit of $30 billion.

Senator Thériault: And that is where you do not make the difference in the case of this $30 billion deficit.

Senator Asselin: Billions.

Senator Flynn: And you don't make the difference.

Senator Thériault: The $30 billion deficit is at the provincial level. Provinces administered by a Conservative governments have unbelievable deficits. In New Brunswick, in the last 14 years, the Conservative government has increased threefold the accumulated deficit of the province since Confederation.

Senator Flynn: At the federal level, what is the proportion?

Senator Thériault: Probably the same, but the revenues are much bigger and in proportion, I believe that the debt in New Brunswick is as high and probably higher than the one at the federal level.

But let us go back to the matter at issue. I say that health care is as important and necessary to the people as education. Can you imagine a system where to go to the primary or secondary school children of a family of four, five, six or seven would have to pay $2,000 per year, the same as the children of senators, doctors, shopkeepers or people who earn between $75,000 and $100,000 per year? This is the system which applies in Ontario and Alberta, where the same price is charged.

Senator Flynn: The law does not change this situation.

Senator Thériault: That is what I say. If I had to blame Ottawa for something—you did it yourself—I would say that this measure does not go far enough. Thus, understand that some people want to do all they can to provide the citizens and the poor with the services they need.

Honourable senators, I hope that the Senate will, as soon as possible, pass this bill on second and third readings, to put an end to the situation in New Brunswick, my own province, where for the past 18 months, the old and the poor, who had to go to the emergency department of a hospital were charged $6. If that $6 charge to be applied to everybody, I would not object.

Moreover, I must say, Senator Hébert, that I appreciated your speech, because in so doing, you have shown your concern for the health care of the Canadian people.

Senator Asselin: What about Senator Flynn?

Senator Thériault: Senator Flynn does not have a clear position as is always the case with the Conservatives. They backed down in the case of medicare and all social programs since Confederation. For example, when it is time to vote—

Senator Flynn: Who was the architect of medicare? Mr. Diefenbaker.

Senator Thériault: Medicare and all the programs put into place, are the work of all the Liberal governments which have been in power since Confederation.

Senator Flynn: Who set the standards? You do not seem to know.

Senator Thériault: Who was the government in the fall of 1968 and then in 1966? Who was the national government at the time of medicare?

Senator Flynn: Who set the ground for it?

Senator Thériault: There are so many things Senator Flynn has said that stand to be corrected. I am not saying that Bill C-3 is perfect, but I believe that the committee report is a good report and I wonder what Senator Flynn has to say about section 2. I quote him:

It would also allow the federal government, after discussion with the affected provincial governments, to impose penalties on provinces which otherwise did not comply with the five principles of medicare.

And then Senator Flynn listed the five criteria for that. Is he against such criteria?

Senator Flynn: I said that it did not affect only user fees, that was a remark from me. But there are other penalties besides extra billing.

Senator Thériault: Should there not be any?

Senator Flynn: I did not say that, but I pointed out that it would create a problem—

Senator Thériault: The thrust of Bill C-3 is the protection of health care users. That measure might not go far enough for that goal to be reached and it might not cover all aspects of the situation. But it is at least a beginning and it is a continuation of the policy of the Liberal Party and of all Liberal governments since 1867 which is still being pursued here.

I urge my colleagues to support that bill and I am sure Senator Flynn will vote for it.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, with your permission, I will try to stick to the point under discussion here. I will not intervene as far as the total thrust of the bill is concerned unless I have to.

But I feel I ought to remind the Senate of the origin of that bill in the words of the Minister of Health when she appeared before the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology which has been considering that bill since January 18.

In answering a question by Senator Asselin, who asked her and I quote:

Has the Minister had the opportunity to discuss these amendments with her provincial counterparts and, if so, what was their reaction?

Miss Bégin replied:

Mr. Chairman, to answer Senator Asselin's question, may I say that in the course of the Medicare crisis, I finally obtained a consensus in May 1982 on the issue of control of extra-billing and user charges, which meant that some extra-billing and user charges would be permitted.

Where is the very categorical principle that Senator Thériault has just defended and which is in the bill? At one time, in 1982, there was an agreement to standardize, regulate, control, prevent extra billing and user charges from going too far. There was a consensus in 1982, not on the absolute exclusion, but on some limits in that regard.

Furthermore, I am not the only one to understand that this is the real meaning of the text. The translator said:

• (1540)

[English]

—which meant that some extra-billing and user charges would be permitted.

[Translation]

Thus that is where it begins. The minister said:

Several months later, we no longer had a consensus. They called me and told me: "It's all in your head, there's no problem".

Why? As Mr. Castonguay said yesterday when he appeared before the committee, it seems to me that the problem is not as tragic as all that, as far as user charges and extra billing are concerned. In her evidence, before the committee, Miss Bégin said:

When I became the Minister of Health some six years ago, extra billing for patient services represented about $50 million. Now, six years later, extra billing represents between $100 and $200 million, but closer to $100 million. Of course, the exact figures are not available.

So, since the beginning of January, I imagine Senator Hébert received the exact figures since earlier today he said that it was less than $150 million, if I am not mistaken, or close to $150 million. Miss Bégin said between $100 and $200 but closer to $200 million. So, this is about $150 million.

What does an amount of $150 million represent? Further on, Miss Bégin refers to total health expenditures by both levels of government.

Let us suppose, for example, that health insurance is a $20 billion project . . .

That is about what it costs. Well, $150 million out of $20 billion is about .75 per cent. There you are, .75 per cent, the health crisis!

Let us get back to the genesis of the bill. It was the increase from $50 million to $150 million which prompted Miss Bégin to shy away from the consensus in 1982, when it was agreed that extra billing and user fees could only go so far. Until then, they were not rejected outright. The consensus broke down because the provincial ministers told her that .75 per cent was not really that much of a problem.

So on she goes with her reasoning.

I was therefore forced to take a new approach—federal legislation.

Presumably, the consensus broke down because there was no agreement about the practical aspect of things. As the minister says, she then took a new approach, the agreement and consensus which had been the rule in previous years. As to how to proceed, there is a new approach, a federal act:

Since no one seemed to know what it was all about, my provincial colleagues and I agreed that there would be no point in discussing and needlessly raising fears, that the best thing to do was to draft a bill and take it from there.

Miss Bégin drafted a bill which was introduced in the House of Commons. The minister then goes on to say:

I left right away to meet with each provincial minister. It was the first real text. So I asked each one of them to submit his amendments, and they all have done that since then.

SENATOR ASSELIN: Have the amendments which you are proposing to Parliament been submitted to the provincial authorities?

HON. MISS BÉGIN: The proposed amendments are the end result of my visits to each of the provinces in early January.

SENATOR ASSELIN: Have provincial officials been apprised of these amendments since then?

HON. MISS BÉGIN: I'm not sure I understand your question.

That's what the minister said. Then Senator Asselin says:

You will be tabling the amendments in the other place. In fact, they have already been tabled. Therefore, they will soon be before us for consideration.

And he asks his question again:

. . . What I would like to know is whether these amendments were reviewed by the provinces prior to their tabling in the House?

HON. MISS BÉGIN: That's not exactly the procedure that was followed. These amendments came about as a result of my meetings with the provinces. If you want to know whether the . . .

. . . provinces had an opportunity to study the exact wording of these amendments, then the answer is no. The amendments were tabled in the committee and were drafted with the help of senior officials.

SENATOR ASSELIN: That's what I wanted to know.

Miss Bégin adds:

Pressure groups also had a hand in drafting these amendments. A number of amendments . . .

At that precise moment, a generous soul, Senator Frith, made the following observation:

If I understand correctly, you are saying that provincial authorities co-authored, so to speak, the amendments that were tabled in the House?

The answer which follows is to the credit of Miss Bégin:

● (1550)

[English]

No. I cannot say that. We must not forget that some of the amendments were made before the committee. I started by tabling a list of possible amendments introduced by the government. These amendments were sent to the provinces and, I hope, were at the request of the provinces, though they were not negotiated word for word with the provinces. They are federal government amendments which have been modified in committee by the parties represented.

[Translation]

Consultations with the provinces have certainly not been very meaningful, to say the least. That was the situation on January 18. After that, the bill, with the amendments introduced then, went through the usual stages in the Commons. Many witnesses, including provincial representatives, appeared before the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Provinces are a level of government with total primacy in their own field of jurisdiction just like the federal government. One can easily imagine that they were not very happy with that kind of procedure whereby they had to appear before a federal committee similar to a court of justice to defend their constitutional jurisdictions and their primacy. They had no choice but to do it. The results of those sittings have been quite correctly evaluated as unsatisfactory.

That is where the Senate committee enters the picture. It sent to the provinces an invitation to appear and state their views during our advance study of the bill. As one can readily understand, they took advantage of that invitation to appear as a group and voice their opposition to the bill. They complained more particularly about the lack of meaningful consultation at earlier stages. Unless I misunderstood the ensuing discussions in committee, the provinces were ready to meet with the federal minister in order to alleviate certain problems and, at the very least, to solve, if only through a more adequate wording, the most contentious issues concerning our federal system.

The bill is not urgent and it would not be dramatic, even for the federal Health Minister, if we were to allow a few weeks for a much needed meeting. The Senate, being above partisan squabbles, is more conscious of the respect we should have for our federal system. That is why we should clearly show our support in providing that opportunity for a meeting even Miss Bégoin would welcome. It seems to me that in doing so the Senate is playing its true role. Otherwise, what would be the situation? Once again, we would find ourselves in a confrontation situation without any minimum dialogue to try to explore any possibility to reduce that tension which will certainly follow if we refuse to play that positive role, that is to give a few weeks in order that the federal minister of Health could meet again with her colleagues if she is not looking definitely for confrontation. She could offer a minimum answer to the views expressed by the health ministers who appeared before our committee.

Also some ministers raised some constitutional questions which are not without foundation. In such a case I believe the meeting could take place if the motion of Senator Flynn could be adopted in order to get some clarifications. Consequently, without engaging in a discussion on the content of the bill or some specific clauses but only on the amendment it seems to me that the amendment will give to the Senate an opportunity to play its true role. That is the reason why I support it without hesitation.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.:

That further consideration of this bill be delayed until June 1, 1984, in order to enable the Federal Minister of Health to meet collectively with her Provincial and Territorial counterparts in whose opinion more discussion would be highly desirable since it could conceivably result in the parties' resolving their differences.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

[Senator Tremblay.]

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, before we adjourn may I remind the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce that a meeting is scheduled for later today in room 356-S. It would be very much appreciated if the members of that committee attended that meeting.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, April 12, 1984

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-12, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, April 17.

Motion agreed to.

MARITIME DEFENCE

RESPONSE OF DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE TO COMMITTEE REPORT TABLED

On Presentation of Petitions:

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the response of the Department of National Defence to the report on Canada's Maritime Defence, that was prepared by the Subcommittee on National Defence of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and presented some months ago.

In addition, I have an address on the same subject that I would make when the inquiry standing in my name is called. It would take me about 25 minutes to deliver. I have copies in both French and English. For the information of honourable senators, perhaps this address could be printed as an appendix to Debates of the Senate of today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of address see appendix p. 489.)

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the Third Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I am not asking that it be appended to the minutes of today's proceedings. The reason is that this report is exactly the same as the Fourth Report of the First Session, which was presented to the Senate and House of Commons in July 1980.

While a fair number of the recommendations in that report were adopted by the government, particularly on the question of notice and comment, by the institution of a regulatory agenda, some have been ignored. The purpose of our bringing back this report is because of the new rules of the House of Commons whereby, when a report is tabled in the House of Commons and the committee so requests, the government has to respond within certain time limits. So the sole purpose is that the government will now have to formally reply to this report, which was presented to Parliament in July 1980.

MARITIME DEFENCE

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I am grateful to the Leader of the Government in the Senate for tabling the response of the government to the report of what was the Subcommittee on National Defence entitled "Canada's Maritime Defence." He has also given notice of inquiry on this matter. I suggest that we leave this notice of inquiry on the Order Paper for a little while. If that is not satisfactory, I will give notice of a similar inquiry upon our return after Easter, because the minister is appearing before the National Defence Committee Tuesday morning to discuss this response, and some members of the committee may wish to offer further comments in this chamber at a later date.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think the best procedure is that suggested by Senator Lafond, that we leave the inquiry and consider the document that is tabled as part of the material that is available to honourable senators on the inquiry. The inquiry will serve as the basis for debate on the report and other matters relating to it.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE SUBJECT-MATTER OF BILL C-13

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, April 17, 1984 I will move that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-13, intituled: "An Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

Honourable senators, to avoid either a misunderstanding or having to check the contents of Bill C-13, this bill does not deal with the proposed Canadian security intelligence service but with amendments to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

SENATE REFORM

RESPONSE OF GOVERNMENT TO REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a comment regarding Debates of the Senate, of Tuesday, April 10. The matter was brought to my attention yesterday by an honourable senator.

At the beginning of the sitting on April 10, the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicated that he would be tabling the response of the government to the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform. There was agreement and the response was printed. In the English edition of Hansard the letter is addressed to the Honourable Paul Cosgrove of the House of Commons. I was asked why the Senate was not included, and why the response was not made to both houses. The explanation is that, as is frequently the case with joint committees, one of the joint chairmen is English-speaking and the other is French-speaking. I was the French-speaking joint chairman. The letter I received from the Prime Minister's office was in French. Hence, I refer honourable senators to Débats du Sénat.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, that is the reason why the response seems to have been sent to each of the houses in one language only.

Honourable senators will therefore have to refer to both versions.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday next, 17th April, 1984, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before we consider the motion perhaps I could ask a question or two. Looking at our activities for next Tuesday, I find it is a pretty busy day. There is a meeting of the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee at 9.30, of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee at 9.45, of the National Defence Committee at 10 o'clock and of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee at 11 o'clock. This leaves us with four committees strung pretty closely together. We are now being asked to consider yet another one in the afternoon when the Senate is sitting. I point out that the Transport and Communications Committee is scheduled to meet at 1.30 p.m. This shows the pressure of attendance which is now being placed on the opposition to try and man all these committees.

I guess this is something like whistling in the wind! I will not get much of a response from anybody. However, I feel obliged to point out to members of this chamber that this move places us in a very difficult position indeed with four committees scheduled to meet in the morning and two in the afternoon, to say nothing of the Senate itself. What can be done to make these arrangements a little more practical from our point of view?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to comment on this matter. Other than the very occasional time when there may be three committees sitting, ordinarily there is never more than two sitting at the same time. If two opposition members attend each of these committees then that accounts for only four senators out of 22 from the opposition. I do not see what strain that places on the opposition. I simply do not understand the attitude taken by the opposition that they cannot provide four people out of the 22 opposition senators.

Senator Roblin: I do not really think I will be able to satisfy Senator Godfrey with my reply, since he seems to have made up his mind already with respect to how this affects those of us who really have to do the work on this side of the house.

I should point out to my honourable friend that we are supposed to provide four people for each committee; and we do our very best to provide those four committee members. The people who belong to these committees wish to attend and do their part. If we were to follow my honourable friend's implied suggestion that we need not bother with all this, then it would soon reduce us to a pretty silly position.

I hope the Leader of the Government can offer me some comfort, even if he might not be able to oblige Senator Godfrey.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure I can offer anyone any comfort.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is that I resent the statement made by Senator Godfrey. To be very diplomatic—he does not know what the hell he is talking about. If he looks at the number of senators on his side of the house and the number on our side he will understand there is no way we can continually attend these committees when, as our Deputy Leader says, they overlap. It is all right for him, he simply has to speak to his able Whip, Senator Petten, who sees that there are Liberals in attendance at these committee meetings.

Hon. Jack Marshall: He is only on one committee.

Senator Muir: Senator Godfrey is only on one committee. That makes somewhat of a difference, considering that we have to fill out the numbers on these committees with the number of senators we have on this side of the house. I think Senator Godfrey will understand that what I am trying to say is that it is not easy to have just two senators at each committee.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am on three committees. I have had no problem whatsoever recently in attending the meetings of a fourth committee. I am speaking of the National Defence Committee, of which I am not a member. This is because the committees have not been that busy lately. In the recent past we have had two committees sitting at the same time and occasionally there have been difficulties in achieving a quorum of four with respect to each of these two committees. In other words, there were difficulties in finding eight senators out of 92 to make up a quorum with respect to only two committees sitting at the same time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to rise on a genuine point of order. The question is whether or not leave has been granted with respect to this motion.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It has been granted.

Senator Frith: If it has been granted then the motion can be put.

Motion agreed to.

● (1410)

HON. ROBERT MUIR

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I would like to say to the Deputy Leader of the Government that I do not take his snide remark very kindly when he said, in a pontifical manner, "This is a genuine point of order." when he rose—do not shake your head; when you have spent as much time in this chamber and the other chamber as some of us, you will perhaps know a little more about it.

When senators are asked to be in three or four different places at one time, I am surely entitled to rise on a point of order. Perhaps only if you come from Big TO like Senator Godfrey, you can say, "I can be in three or four committees at one time." I do not understand how he can do that. Even when he is there, he is not contributing a great deal and I, for one, cannot see how we can divide ourselves into so many pieces, and I resent it, Mr. Speaker. I rose on a genuine point of order.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I do not think it was.

Senator Muir: Of course, Senator Frith. It is my experience that you seem to differ on everything unless it is going your way.

[Senator Muir.]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: There is no question of a point of order; we were having a debate on a motion, and I joined in the debate.

I would also like to point out that, from 9.00 a.m. until 11.00 a.m. today, there were no committees meeting. We have all the time in the world for committee meetings.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STANDING COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, may I state that, as a chairman, I do appreciate the co-operation that I have always received from members of the opposition in their attendance at meetings of committees.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That for the balance of the present Session, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesdays, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think we would be well advised to consider this next week when we see what is going on in the committee.

CANADA HEALTH BILL

SECOND READING

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hébert, seconded by the Honourable Senator Thériault, for the second reading of the Bill C-3, intituled: "An Act relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services provided under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof".—(Honourable Senator Roblin P.C.).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I must say that, since all the big guns have spoken in this debate, there remains very little for me to do except, perhaps, to underline a couple of the points that have already been made in order to present the issue, at least as I see it, before the chamber.

It was interesting to hear Senator Hébert introduce this bill as he did, and although he spoke mostly in French, and I must admit that I probably did not appreciate each and every nuance of what he had to say and have not yet read the Debates of the Senate, I got the impression that he was pretty clearly in favour of the government line as laid down by Madame Bégin. That is not really very surprising, because when a member introduces a bill into the house on behalf of the government, he usually approves of most of what that bill contains. In fact, if that member is a frontbencher, he approves of all of it without any problems at all.

However, occasionally, backbenchers have a licence to raise, perhaps, a question or two. It is not often done, I admit, if that is any comfort to Senator Hébert but I remember quite recently that when Senator Buckwold, as a backbencher, was introducing a bill, he was able to point out one or two possible deficiencies in the legislation.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): There are no deficiencies in this bill.

Senator Roblin: That seems to be the assumption, that there are no deficiencies in this bill. What strikes me as curious is how the Leader of the Government can hold that view in any serious way after the representations that have been made in the pre-study of the bill itself. That is really the issue which I wish to address before I resume my seat. We got the pure, undiluted milk of the word from Senator Hébert, and I am not critical of him in that respect, because we have become accustomed to that. Perhaps if I ever get to sit on the other side of this chamber I will expect the same kind of treatment from some of the backbenchers on our side, so I shall reserve my position in that respect.

With respect to Senator Thériault, I appreciated his emphatic—and I underline that word—defence of the principle of medicare, medical services and hospital services that we have built up in this country. I know that he is sensitive to the fact that any hint of criticism of medicare at any level is capable of being interpreted, at least by him, as being anti-medical treatment, anti-hospital services and anti-medicare.

I suppose it is bootless to try to persuade him that people are entitled to a difference of opinion on matters of some importance in this field without, at the same time, going so far as to condemn or to dispense with or to divert our attention from our current situation with respect to that kind of social service to another situation that might be presented. It is bootless to try to persuade him, particularly if a Progressive Conservative makes that statement, because ipso facto, that proves we are against medicare.

However, let me say that it may be somewhat disappointing to some honourable senators on the other side to know that we are supporters of medicare; we are supporters of the health system; and we are supporters of the doctor system as well.

The thrust of this bill has been variously described to us and, of course, has to do with the question of extra-billing and user fees. The minister described the situation in the other place, and I hope I am not exaggerating when I say that she has characterized it as being “out of control”; yet when one examines the merits of the case or the details of the case, it is quite clear that the evidence is not completely convincing, to put it mildly, that the provinces are conspiring to deprive citizens of their proper access to medical and hospital services. I, for one, do not think that the situation is out of control.

Of course, there are other issues in this bill. The provinces made it clear that clause 2 concerned them to a large extent because it appears to change definitions, and when one changes definitions—particularly if those changes appear to enlarge definitions—then, of course, one is opening the door to new financial responsibilities because the definitions have been changed to expand the area of services.

Some provinces—and I am by no means competent to judge this matter in this chamber now—maintain that that expansion of the definitions found in clause 2 may have the effect of increasing their financial responsibilities without, at the same time, ensuring that the federal government itself recognizes their expenses as part of its fiscal sharing responsibility. That is an important issue and is one that should be carefully examined to determine the accuracy of the points of view.

There has been some discussion as to how one will settle wage rates and schedules with those involved in providing health services, including doctors. In clause 12 there is a very curious formula, although I know that its origin was not without the assistance of members from all political parties in the other place. I do not think it makes it any better because of that. This peculiar formula seems to say to me in its rather ambiguous form that one can have arbitration with doctors, if you like, but that if one does not like the arbitration, one has the power to annul the results.

It seems to me that one is either for arbitration or one is not; if one is for arbitration at stage one, and the answer is not satisfactory at the arbitration stage, one can annul that at stage two. That seems to be a doubtful recommendation to make to anyone, and when the annulment takes the form of an act of the provincial legislatures, the political fall out from that surely creates a situation which must be of concern.

There was a very interesting appeal made by the Province of Saskatchewan regarding who decides, because in this bill, if there are penalties to be imposed on the provinces, it is because the federal administration has decided that somebody is breaking the rules. In normal circumstances, one would expect the government to take that responsibility, but the fact is that we are dealing with two levels of government, one of whom is sovereign in the field, if I can use that term rather loosely, namely the provinces, and the other, the federal government, making a contribution by virtue of its federal spending power. In that situation it seems to me that it would be useful to consider whether there could be some method of arbitration, some appeal, some way of getting around the fact that the federal government is judge and jury in its own cause. That is not an unreasonable proposal. It came from one of the provinces and I, for one, would certainly like to see it given more consideration.

That does not go to the heart of the matter as far as I am concerned. These objections to the bill are perhaps well taken, and I have no hesitation in pointing them out to the chamber, but they do not go to the heart of the bill. What goes to the heart of the problem here is the overriding issue, which I ask this house to consider, of the appeal that the provinces made to a committee of the Senate for more consideration and more consultation. That is the nub of my concern with this bill. I want to say that in the committee meeting, which I had the honour to attend, the provinces, without exception, insofar as I know, asked for more consultation. They gave no guarantee, nor do I give one, that more consultation would mean that there would be no problems left after the process was over. I do not think that is probable, but they did give the very clear impression—in fact they stated it in so many words—that progress could be achieved towards a closer meeting of minds in respect of the disputed portions of this bill if there were further opportunity for consultation, consideration and discussion.

It seems to me that we, in the Senate, must consider that appeal to us as a serious one. We must remember that we had before us, as others have said, probably for the first time as far as I am concerned, all the provinces coming to a Senate committee asking us to do something. They wanted us to do something about what? About the application of the federal spending power. That is what is at the back of the decision. That point was made very clearly by my colleague, Senator Tremblay, when he spoke about this the other day. Those of us who have been in this house for some time—at any rate since 1980—will remember that we had a committee of the Senate that looked into the question of certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution. One of the issues that they reviewed was the overriding federal spending power. If you look at page 5 of their report you will see that they analyzed this particular aspect of our Constitution and concluded that the federal spending power is one of those powers which should remain in our Constitution, and that it can be used, as it has been used and, no doubt, will be used for very good purposes. They point out that, essentially, it involves one of the central issues of the federal state, that is, how to reconcile the initiatives of the federal government with the views of those other governments which are not subordinate to the federal government in that field of activity. This committee to which our late lamented colleague, Senator Lamontagne, made such a great contribution, and to which, indeed, my colleague Senator Tremblay made a distinguished contribution, epitomized the matter in this way when talking about the spending power:

So the problem remains of harmonizing the exercise of these overriding federal powers with the principle of non-subordination.

That is a central problem of the Canadian federation and it is at the heart of the difficulty which some of us see in this bill today.

What is the role of the Senate? The Lamontagne report contained certain recommendations about the role of the Senate, but we have a far more authoritative statement than that about the role of the Senate. That is contained in the report that was made by the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform, copies of which we received courtesy of Senator Molgat a short time ago, which dealt with the constitutional position of the Senate and what it is supposed to do. The most important function of the Senate, as defined by that special joint committee has to do with the primary role of the Senate in this whole field of regional representation. That is at the heart of the issue as I see it today. Not only that, yesterday the Prime Minister offered his commentary on the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform when he said:

I think your recommendation for an elected Senate should be understood in relation to your strong recommendation that the reformed Senate's primary role should be regional representation.

He then goes on to say that he endorses that view of our responsibilities.

Honourable senators, if any of these things have any merit—if the studies that have been made and our own reflections upon our function and capacity have any real meaning—then they have a relationship to what went on in that committee the other day. They have a relationship when one considers that all of the provinces appeared before the Senate committee and asked the Senate to do something. I think that the provinces expressed a vote of confidence in the Senate which I have never heard before, in that they came to this body actually expecting us to do something. They came to this body actually expecting the Senate to consider its role in respect of regional representation and to express that in an effective way.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That was the first time.

Senator Roblin: For the first time, my colleague says; as far as I know, it is the first time. At that committee meeting there was indicated an expression of confidence—or, perhaps, hope, I am not sure which word is more correct—in respect of what the Senate is supposed to do in the parliamentary system of Canada and in our whole system of government. It seems that they understand that we have a responsibility to see that regional views are adequately considered. It seems that they have an understanding of the fact that sober second thought is a part of the responsibility of the Senate, which certainly implies to me that these sober second thoughts should be timely and effective. But what the committee has done is rush to lock the door after the horse is gone. The committee is recommending that we pass the bill, after which we will have a look at all of these great problems and see if we can do something about them.

I suppose that the first thing that statement does is admit that there is a problem. But it seems to me that we salve our consciences by saying that, although there is a problem, we are not going to do anything about it right now. Later on we may get around to it—and probably we will get around to it and will likely do some good; I hope we will—but effectively, today, in the face of the appeal of the provinces, we are not offering to do very much.

Honourable senators, we have heard this appeal but it looks to me as though we are not going to respond to it. If anyone wishes to take the view that the Senate is, indeed, the fifth wheel of the constitutional chariot, this will certainly give such a person some ammunition when considering this particular problem. One has to ask oneself this question: If this is the result of a unanimous appeal by the provinces when coming to a committee of the Senate that we hear but do not respond to in any effective way, when we will see them again? I wonder when they will come again before this body to present a united view in the hope that we will exercise our constitutional responsibility. I do not think the outlook is very bright. I think that they are going to write us off as a lost cause. They are going to say that what the Senate does is certainly a little different from the constitutional responsibility which it has and which they themselves accept as part of their job—regional representation and the question of sober second thought.

Honourable senators, I think that is all I want to say on this difficult issue this afternoon. It seems to me, at any rate, that the Senate is less than forthcoming with respect to its role in the constitutional process; it is less than forthcoming in its response to the provinces. While this bill may receive second reading this afternoon—and I really expect that it will—it seems to me that we should not allow ourselves to be locked into a position now from which nothing further can be done.

I therefore have a proposal to make to the Leader of the Government and to those on the other side, and it is this; after this bill receives second reading—as I expect it will quite shortly—I think they should give some thought to what they do with it. I would hope that they would not send it back to the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. Although, in the first instance, it is within the jurisdiction of that committee, I would like to see the bill sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. That is the committee which has been discussing the function of the Senate in the federal parliamentary system; that is the committee which deals with subjects like the federal spending power and how the Senate can help make things run a little more smoothly as between the federal and provincial governments. I think that that committee can probably make some contribution to a positive response to the provinces, which, so far, we have not been able to find or which has not been approved by a majority of this house. I do not give up the thought or the hope that, if the bill were referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, we might find some way in which to give the provinces what they have asked for, which is more consultation and a greater consideration by the federal authorities of the provincial authorities' point of view. I do not know what will happen, but I believe it is worth a try. Therefore, honourable senators, I hope that when this bill is disposed of at this stage, we will not let the opportunity slip by of having this matter examined for its constitutional implications in respect of the role of the Senate, rather than merely to treat it as another bill going through the hopper.

• (1430)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, may I ask the Deputy Leader of the Opposition a question?

Senator Roblin: Yes.

Senator Godfrey: The primary role of the Senate should be regional representation. The honourable senator may recall that I had a motion on the Order Paper for over a year to the effect that, as a general policy, where provinces were particularly interested in a subject, and wherever practicable, they should be invited to appear before the committee. I received support for the general idea, but I could get no support to pass that motion formally—which was almost a motherhood resolution—as a resolution of the Senate.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You will have to speak to your leader first.

Senator Godfrey: In view of what the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has said, and the fact that I have already announced that I shall reintroduce that motion, can we expect his support of that motion when it is reintroduced in the Senate?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend has the opportunity to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, as I suggest, then his constructive and attractive suggestion will receive the consideration it deserves.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on the first point raised by Senator Roblin, namely, that he is afraid that the provinces will never again appear before Senate committees because we didn't do what they asked us to do, I hope that is not the inference. They were heard, and, of course, they can hold the view that "Although we appeared before the Senate committee and they gave us a hearing, the government did not agree with what we were suggesting, and therefore there is no point in our going there". If the only reason they wished to appear before the committee was to receive support for whatever they suggested, then I suppose it is reasonable to expect that they may not come very often. But, on behalf of the government, I hope that they will continue to appear before our committees and that there will be occasions when we can support their suggestions. This happens not to be one of those occasions.

On the question of the reference to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, I discussed that matter with Senator Flynn yesterday, and I see some merit in the suggestion of having the overall question of our relationship with the provinces considered by that committee, which, under our rules, deals with federal-provincial relations.

However, I feel that in this case the subject matter of the bill has been studied by the Social Affairs Committee and, if more detailed study is necessary, it should be considered by the committee in whose mandate the subject principally falls. It seems to me that we cannot work with the concept that each time a bill raises a question of federal-provincial relations, it should go to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, since that question applies to so many bills. At some appropriate time—and this is not considered to be that time—the committee might very well study that dimension.

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Hébert speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, before the honourable senator proceeds, may I ask him a question based on a letter written by Dr. Baltzan, Past President of the Canadian Medical Association. I should like to have Dr. Baltzan's point of view answered, because I feel some unease about the rather swift way that we are dealing with this bill. I realize that the bill has been considered in the other place for some time, but, as honourable senators are aware, we have not yet received the published report of the committee dealing with the evidence given by the provincial health ministers. Therefore, those of us who were unable to attend that meeting have not been able to review the questioning.

I should like to ask the honourable senator to comment on Dr. Baltzan's statement. Referring to the excellent health care system existing in Canada, his letter says:

All these successes, humanitarian and financial, could not have been achieved without the dedication and co-operation of physicians. This occurred because of the unique nature of the system that we Canadians have devised: Unique because of an extensive government role but without compulsion and authoritarian regulation.

The Canada Health Act will change all this. It will remove the freedom of choice and compel physicians to enroll in the government plan; there is no other means to achieve the aim of the act. It will lessen doctors' civil rights compared with those enjoyed by other citizens; nobody else in peacetime has been conscripted into government service. And in reality it will lessen everybody's civil rights: What can happen to one group can happen to all.

Canadians have benefited enormously from a health care system that is manned by volunteers. It is unlikely that the same benefits will result from a system manned by demoralized conscripts.

In another part of the letter, it says:

What is broken and badly in need of fixing—

Excluding the obvious things such as the current economic situation:

—is serious underfunding of hospital care for capital and operating purposes.

In his letter, Dr. Baltzan also says:

Before coming to a decision on this act, two bits of common horse sense should be considered.

First, extra-billing may have some defects, but is the cure worse than the disease?

I might say that in British Columbia we do not have extra billing. We do have a very modest user fee to which no one objects. The letter continues to say that the answer to the question as to whether the cure is worse than the disease is an overwhelming "yes." It continues:

Second, "if it ain't broke, don't fix it," Medicare in Canada is not broken, nor even bent.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

I should like to hear some comments from the honourable senator on Dr. Baltzan's observations.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I would say quite simply to Senator Bell that I think I anticipated her concerns in my speech yesterday. My very brief remarks today ought to complete my answer.

In his comments yesterday, Senator Flynn tried to justify his suggestion—that we ought to delay the adoption of Bill C-3—by raising arguments which, in my opinion, were specious or doubtful at best.

Today, Senator Roblin echoed the views of his colleague, but in more carefully chosen words, as he is wont to do.

Among other things, Senator Flynn referred to the issue of direct costs—negligible, according to him. He championed the cause of the provincial Ministers of Health who have decried the lack of consultation. He also maintained that the bill does not take into consideration the current and future problems of the Canadian health system.

[English]

Although my remarks covered a broad range of the issues, and although my honourable colleagues and seconder of the motion, Senator Thériault, responded eloquently and positively to the points raised by Senator Flynn, I should like to add a few remarks for the record.

Senator Flynn, in speaking of extra billing and user charges, suggested that in aggregate $100 million to $150 million were insignificant in relation to the total cost of health care. Yes, it is true that such amounts are insignificant in total. However, Canadians who suffer from recurring illness, or require a long period of convalescence following a stroke or heart attack, can be faced with a very heavy financial burden depending on where the illness occurs, what kind of physician services they require, and the number of treatments that may be required. This is partly an answer to questions raised by Senator Bell.

The issue is not a fiscal issue. It is a very human issue for the ordinary man on the street.

[Translation]

In the eyes of the patients, user fees and extra-billing are one and the same thing. They are additional costs which they must bear even though they have already paid for their health care plan by way of federal or provincial taxes.

For the consumer, the fact that these additional charges are collected by the provincial government through the hospital system or by the physicians after a visit to their office is not important. It is an additional and often unexpected bill that has to be paid.

As we all know, most Canadian families could not pay the actual costs of health care. Collectively, they have to rely on the health insurance plan. Sometimes, they may not understand how this plan works exactly, or they may be unable to express their concerns, or they may not know what is the actual cost of health care and how it is financed. Nevertheless, Canadians know that they have one of the best health care systems in the world, that the care they receive is paid for in advance and that it is free whenever they need it.

We must also take into consideration the overall effect of these additional costs on a universal health insurance plan. If direct costs are to be still more generalized, the well organized groups will require additional private insurance coverage to protect themselves. When you have money, you can always find a solution. If insurance of this type were to become available, the deterrent effect would cease to exist for those who would be covered, while the poor and the senior citizens would have some fees to pay each time they are sick. The fact is that the protection provided by private insurance has already appeared in the form of plans which offer cash benefits.

[English]

The Canada Health Act is preventative in that regard, not punitive. I certainly hope that concept can be grasped by honourable senators. We, above all, should know and understand that Canadians are a caring and sharing society, concerned about the plight of individuals and families who have the misfortune of illness. Surely we should not regard this issue as insignificant.

I should touch briefly upon the issue of consultation which was raised again by Senator Roblin, both as it relates to the process leading up to this bill and within the context of the bill itself.

During her appearance before the Senate committee, the Honourable Monique Bégin spoke at length about the process of consultation, public discussion and debate leading up to this bill. I will not repeat the long history but will simply refer you to the Senate committee proceedings of Wednesday, March 21, 1984. In January, the minister met with all provincial health ministers to discuss the bill itself and, indeed, the draft regulations. A number of significant amendments were made to the bill in response to those concerns and were introduced by the government at second reading stage. These included building in a three-part consultation process in section 14; a 30 day waiting period to allow public and parliamentary debate before a cabinet order takes effect; required consultation on estimates of user charges and extra-billing; significant alteration to the regulatory powers in section 22, eliminating some, making some subject to provincial agreement or, at least, prior consultation; defining precise limits on long-term chronic care user charges in section 19.2; modifying the preamble, purposes and objectives of the bill to remove wording found objectionable to some provinces; limiting visibility to public documents and subject to consultation; and removing "adequate" payment from section 12 to alleviate fears of the provinces that the federal government could act as a budget appeal board.

These points illustrate, I believe, that the government did consult and did listen to the provinces in the process of drafting this bill. Moreover, it shows that the federal government is required by law to consult and achieve agreement in some instances before acting to protect the fundamental principles of medicare. In summary, there has been significant consultation, negotiation and discussion in bringing this bill to this stage and there are several safeguards in the bill itself requiring consultation, communication and information exchange between the governments.

A final point that I would like to draw to the attention of honourable senators is what transpired in the other place. To suggest that a bill that was passed unanimously by all parties does not reflect the regional interests of the country is, I think, an effrontery to the principles of democratic, parliamentary government. The vote was 213 to 0. This rare expression of unanimity has occurred before. In 1957, the House of Commons voted 157 to 0 in favour of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, despite the objections of some provinces. In 1966, the Medical Care Act passed the house at third reading by a vote of 177 to 2.

This bill consolidates these two pieces of legislation, safeguards the fundamental principles of medicare and, obviously, still enjoys the unanimous support of all parties, from all regions. This institution represents the people of the regions, not provincial governments per se, and it would be remiss in its responsibilities if it failed to take into consideration the popular public support for this legislation.

Senator Flynn focused many of his remarks on what this bill does not do for health care now or for the future. Critics usually resort to two standard lines of argument: "Too little too late" and "Too far too fast."

[Translation]

During the debate on Bill C-3, several senators suggested that the services covered under the federal act be extended to include new fields such as preventive medicine, health promotion, community services and so on. Other issues raised included our aging population, the use of new technology, environmental impact, ways of life and many more.

Since the ambit of Bill C-3 is rather limited, it was obviously impossible to entertain all those worthy suggestions. Suffice it to recall that the purpose of Bill C-3 is to consolidate the existing legislation and take steps to end extra-billing and user charges. It is not intended to expand services covered under the act.

The fact remains, of course, that much remains to be done in the future to improve the health of Canadians. It is important to explore all new ideas in that respect.

The national health insurance program provides the basic services available to all Canadian residents, namely hospital and medical care. Still, many more health services are necessary as well, besides hospital and medical care.

It is imperative to initiate a dialogue among all parties involved—on that we agree—namely the federal and provincial governments, health practitioners, patients and the general public. All those groups share common objectives, but take different means to reach them.

Discussions on Bill C-3 gave us an opportunity to advocate fresh ideas and they should continue.

The Minister of Health proposed a national health conference of all interested parties and partners in the health system. The conference would be a forum to debate all health issues and lead to recommendations for future action. For his part, Senator Bonnell, Chairman of our Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, made a similar suggestion to establish a standing Senate committee.

I fully agree with the suggestions made by Miss Bégin and Senator Bonnell. I firmly believe that it is the way to develop a health system more appropriately geared to the needs of Canadians. Once the foundation or the base is set through the adoption of Bill C-3, that national forum will be the next step.

I commend the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology for its sustained interest in and commitment to an overall health policy for Canadians, and I am in favour of giving the Senate a permanent role in such an endeavour.

[English]

As I stated yesterday, as a Canadian I am proud to support this bill.

● (1450)

Bill C-3 is an essential reaffirmation by Canadians of the endearing values that led to the creation of medicare in the first place. Canadians are a caring, sharing society.

The bill, although at times controversial, enjoys the support of a broad spectrum and a vast majority of Canadians, not to mention all the parties in the other place.

I recall that both of its ancestors—the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act were passed through parliament virtually unanimously and both received Senate approval expeditiously.

I hope, and trust, that this will again be the case and that the proposed Canada Health Act will be passed by the Senate unanimously.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

[Translation]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

Senator Hébert moved that Bill C-3 be referred to the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the chairman of the committee or the sponsor of the bill. Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare appear before the committee? Senators on this side of the house would particularly like the opportunity to question her again with respect to meeting with the provinces. During the last committee hearings representatives of the provinces stated their willingness and desire to meet with the minister.

I would also like to know whether or not law officers of the Crown will be present. There are a number of points which must be clarified. Honourable senators will recall that the provinces questioned clause 12(2) which deals with binding arbitration. Senators on this side of the house would like to have clarification of these points, and others, at the next committee meeting.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, the bill has just been given second reading and it has been moved that it be referred to committee. In anticipation of that, we have called a meeting for Tuesday next at 11 o'clock in the morning in the hope that Senator Phillips, the deputy chairman of the committee, will be there. At that time we hope to hear from officials from the Department of National Health and Welfare. We will endeavour to have the minister there as well. We will also try to have in attendance representatives from the Department of Justice, who might be able to answer honourable senators' questions. I hope at that time Senator Phillip's questions will be answered to his satisfaction.

Senator Phillips: The honourable senator says that he hopes my questions will be answered to my satisfaction. I anticipate, then, that there will be considerable improvement made to the bill in the committee.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, if I might just respond to Senator Phillips, there cannot be much improvement when you get so good that you cannot get better. I can see that it may be difficult to satisfy Senator Phillips, although I think most of the members of the committee will be satisfied.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have almost a request for the committee chairman.

Would it be possible for the committee to hold its meeting at 11.30 a.m. instead of 11 o'clock?

In order for me to attend the committee meeting at 11 o'clock, I would have to leave home the day before; on the other hand, if the committee held its meeting at 11.30 a.m., thanks to the airline timetable, I could leave home in the morning. I was wondering if holding the committee meeting at 11.30 would cause serious problems.

Senator Frith: Would the minister appear at the end of the meeting?

Senator Tremblay: Yes. As the Minister of Health would possibly, if not probably, be present when the meeting starts, I would not want to miss her.

So, if the meeting starts at 11 o'clock and the minister came at 11.30, there would be no problem. On the other hand, if the minister came at 11 o'clock and by 11.30, she had already given the major part of her testimony, then I would have a problem. That is why I should like either the meeting to begin at 11.30, or the minister not to come before 11.30.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wonder if questions about the timing of the meeting and changes thereto could be discussed between Senator Tremblay and the chairman of the committee after our sitting today. There may well be other problems of convenience and timing which can be taken care of later. I am sure that if the convenience of Senator Tremblay, or other senators, or of the minister is in question then that can be worked out that way.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, April 17, 1984 at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, I will explain if leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on Tuesday next we hope to receive the report of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee with respect to Bill C-3 and to give the bill third reading that day. If that is not possible then the bill will be read a third time on Wednesday.

Convening at 2 o'clock will allow us the opportunity to have Royal Assent given to the bill on Tuesday. If we were to sit at 8 o'clock on Tuesday evening then that would not be possible, because the other place does not sit evenings. It is not certain, of course, that the bill will be given third reading on Tuesday.

If no other business comes before us with which we must deal, and we manage to deal with and have Royal Assent given to Bill C-3 on Tuesday, then there is the possibility that we will adjourn on Tuesday instead of Wednesday, until May 8, 1984, according to the understanding between the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY ADOPTED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Anderson).

Hon. Margaret Anderson: Honourable senators, I am pleased to participate this afternoon in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. The program outlined is an extensive one, and I shall deal only with a few of the major sections.

First, we must commend the government and the Prime Minister for taking the initiative in the search for a method to reduce international tensions, and pledging to continue the search for some way to slow the arms race and halt the spread of nuclear weapons. It is appalling to think that, while medicine and science are today working frantically for cures for life-threatening disease, struggling to save the accident victim, and working to improve the health of the nation, hundreds of thousands—millions—are being killed in wars and revolutions around the globe.

Here in Canada, where we follow with anxiety and sympathy the day-to-day news reports of the struggle for life of perhaps one small child, it is hard to comprehend the criminal waste of human life in other parts of the world and the untold suffering of the survivors. And all of this involves what we call "conventional" weapons. A nuclear war would be so final!

Global peace is hanging by a thread. There is only one safeguard: Fear, the fear of an aggressor that reprisal would be swift and devastating. The free nations must be prepared and continually on guard.

Canada will continue to work towards a measure of stability through peacekeeping operations under control of the United Nations. Commitments to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the North American Defence Command will be met, and defensive expenditures will be maintained and increased. Canadians can be proud of the part our country has always played in the defence of freedom; but it has not been without great sacrifice. Canada's five Books of Remembrance, which lie in the Memorial Chamber in the Peace Tower, show how high was the price paid.

June 6 of this year will be the fortieth anniversary of the allied attack on Hitler's Fortress Europe—one of the most fateful periods in modern times. The assault on Europe was the beginning of the end of World War II.

The North Shore (New Brunswick) Regiment was one of the four Canadian regiments that led the D-Day assault wave on the beaches of Normandy 40 years ago, and there is still a great deal of interest in those far-off events. Fortieth anniversary D-Day ceremonies are being held in France this June, 1984, and the whole Normandy area is preparing for a great wave of thousands of returning veterans from all the allied nations for the largest and, perhaps, the last reunion. All the allied forces will be represented at these D-Day ceremonies, and it is hoped that the Canadian forces which took part in the operation will be well represented.

In the Speech from the Throne, the program for continuing the drive towards security for all Canadians is an extensive one, and I shall not deal with all the goals which were outlined. However, I shall refer to some. The health care system must be preserved. I believe this to be imperative. A constant chipping away could lead to its destruction. Medical costs, as we all know, are rising but a way must be found to meet them. Medical care is as fundamental as education, and should be equally available to every citizen. The government will continue its efforts to help reduce long-term costs of health care by prevention programs and other means.

Coupled with continued health care will be increased supplements for those elderly most in need. Also, reforms will be sought to improve pension standards. This portion of the budget will be of particular interest to Senator Croll. Honourable senators will recall the report of the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies of which he was chairman. At that time, flaws in the pension system were pointed out and recommendations made for changes.

At this time, the immediate concern of the government is the need for increased employment, and it has outlined the direction it wishes to take in this regard. Additional funds will be allocated to works programs. A Youth Opportunity Fund will assist young Canadians to acquire new skills and find employment.

The importance of small business is recognized, and access to federal programs will be improved. Productivity will be encouraged. The program for export market development will be extended in order to find additional markets, and to support and encourage trading.

Further measures will be introduced to modernize and upgrade the fishery, forestry, mining and agricultural industries. All of these industries are of major importance to New Brunswick and to my area of Northumberland-Miramichi, but forestry is of particular interest to me. It is New Brunswick's largest industry, embracing pulp and paper mills, sawmills, and planing mills, plywood and veneer mills and other primary and secondary wood industries. It employs, directly or indirectly, one in seven of our labour force and accounts for 38 per cent of our province's exports. In fact, forestry is also the most important industry to Canada as a whole, and is the major contributor to our balance of trade.

Approximately 87 per cent of New Brunswick land is classed as forest land suitable for regular harvest. Forty-six per cent of the forest land is owned by the Crown, and administered and managed by the province through the Department of Natural Resources. Together, Crown lands and large industrial lands represent 70 per cent of the timberland in New Brunswick. The balance is owned by small non-industrial woodlot owners.

Years ago, planting trees was not the imperative matter it is today. The business of cutting trees was more selective. However, with the tremendous increase in demand and the advent of huge harvesting machinery, this is no longer feasible and, in many areas, clear-cutting has of necessity become the order of the day. Hence, reforestation is now of prime importance.

The danger of continued depletion of this natural resource has long been recognized, and successive governments of New Brunswick have taken firm steps to protect the forests. The industrial timberland operators also know that reforestation is of prime importance and programs are under way. One company has been planting trees since 1958.

To combat the spruce budworm, which is perhaps the greatest threat to our forests in living memory, a forest-spraying program has been carried on continuously for over 30 years, since 1952.

To help keep fire losses to a minimum, a fleet of water bombers has been maintained and is on constant alert during the fire danger period. It has been of very real value.

In 1979 a large-scale regeneration program was initiated by the Department of Natural Resources and funded under a federal-provincial agreement. Under this plan, many millions of seedlings have been planted each year. This program will be continued and expanded. Left to nature, trees would take from 50 to 70 years or longer for growth, depending on the species and market requirement. With systematic planting and the superior and hardier type of tree developed by research, it is expected some areas will be ready for harvest in 35 to 50 years.

One of the new programs introduced in the budget—the Conservation Corps to employ Canadians in reforestation and national park development—will be of great assistance to New Brunswick as well as to other provinces.

In forest research, New Brunswick and the Maritimes have been in the forefront. The Maritime Forest Ranger School is located at Fredericton, our capital city, and since 1946 has been training its foresters in the University of New Brunswick's forest. This forest of 3,600 acres has been used for 50 years for the training of foresters. The construction of a new forest ranger school is to be started shortly in the present complex at Fredericton. This is under a federal-provincial cost-sharing agreement recently negotiated between Ottawa and the Council of Maritime Premiers.

The University of New Brunswick offers undergraduate and graduate courses in forestry leading to a Bachelor of Science degree in Forestry and a Master of Science degree. Degree training was first offered by the University of New Brunswick in 1908. Honourable senators will be interested to know that the late Senator Percy Burchill was a member of the first graduating class in forestry in 1910.

Before concluding, I must refer to New Brunswick's bicentennial—the 200th anniversary of the founding of New Brunswick as a separate and distinct province. On the 13th of June 1784, His Majesty, King George III, with the advice of his Privy Council, gave approval for a government to be established under the name of New Brunswick. And now, 200 years later, 1984, the province is having a year-long celebration of thanksgiving and rejoicing. Everyone is joining in—towns and cities, villages and municipalities, churches, organizations, clubs, families and individuals.

Hundreds of events have been planned and are being spread over the entire year. There will be something for everyone and it is hoped that the many visitors to the province this year will join in the festivities.

We are very proud and happy that our Sovereign, Queen Elizabeth II, and Prince Philip, will help us celebrate by visiting New Brunswick in July. We are also all looking forward with joyful anticipation to the historic visit to our province in September of His Holiness Pope John Paul II. Truly, it will be a great year for New Brunswick.

In closing, I wish to again draw attention to the many excellent programs contained in the Speech from the Throne and I trust the necessary support will be given to implement them.

Motion agreed to, and the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne adopted.

On motion of the Honourable Royce Frith, ordered that the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by the Honourable the Speaker.

MARITIME DEFENCE

REPORT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

On the Inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canada's Maritime Defence", tabled in the Senate on 15th June, 1983.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this Inquiry was referred to earlier today when Senator Olson tabled a document representing the response of the minister and the government to the report of the Subcommittee on National Defence.

I am now speaking on this Inquiry on behalf of Senator Olson. I believe the best procedure is to have this Inquiry appear on the Orders of the Day, with the material that was tabled earlier as material for its debate. So, if we can consider the debate now launched on this Inquiry, I will ask Senator Macdonald if he will agree to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTIETH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, SEOUL, KOREA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Peter Bosa rose pursuant to notice of April 5, 1984:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventieth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Seoul, Korea, 4th to 12th October, 1983, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada, and to the delegation's visit to China and their meetings with the officials of that country.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my privilege today to present to the Senate my report on the Seventieth Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference held in Seoul, Korea between October 4 and October 12, 1983.

The Canadian delegation was composed of 11 parliamentarians, headed by Marcel Prud'homme and Allan Lawrence, the chairman and vice-chairman, respectively. Other members of the Canadian delegation were Senator Asselin, Senator Rowe and myself from the Senate and Messrs. Bujold, Gauthier, Halliday, Landers, Neil and Waddell from the House of Commons. Accompanying the delegation were Martin Lavoie and Roger Hill, executive secretary and adviser, respectively, to the delegation. Also accompanying the group were Charles Lussier, Clerk of the Senate, who attended the meetings of the Association of Secretaries-General of Parliaments, together with Claude Desrosiers, Principal Clerk of the House of Commons, and Walter Dean, Assistant to the Clerk of the Parliaments.

Before I deal with the subject matter of the conference, I should like to make a few brief remarks regarding the Republic of South Korea and its people.

First, some statistical information. South Korea is slightly smaller than the island of Newfoundland. It has an area of 98,313 square kilometers, with a population of 40,100,000, according to the 1981 census. Its gross national product in 1982 was $63.8 billion, with a per capita income of $1,627 in U.S. dollars. The Koreans have an export led economy based on a comparative advantage in labour-intensive light industries and, increasingly skill-intensive heavy industry.

● (1520)

Korea is a constitutional republic with an elected national assembly with power centralized in a strong executive. The current President is the Honourable Chun Doo Hwan. Koreans are followers of four different religions: Animism, Confucianism, Buddhism and Christianity. Their language belongs to the Ural-Altaic group.

Koreans are sturdy, brave, courageous and hard-working people. They have been tempered by a history of invasions and tragedy. Nowhere is the tragedy of their recent past more evident than in the Plaza of Hope situated not far from their Parliament Buildings in Seoul. In the plaza are many rows of racks protected by a platform roof where there are hundreds of thousands of posters seeking information about lost family members and relatives who became separated during the last murderous and fratricidal war which ended in 1953. The plaza, spacious as it is, does not provide sufficient space to accommodate the demand, so that the display of posters spills over onto makeshift racks for several blocks in both directions and on both sides of a nearby street.

A couple of years ago a national television station, KBS, embarked on the idea of promoting family reunification by interviewing people who were seeking information about their relatives. This prompted an immediate public response with an avalanche of inquiries. The program was an instant success. Approximately 8,500 people have already been reunited as a result of this initiative taken by that station. A typical notice might read as follows: "My four year-old brother Kim and I were crossing a river on such a date and such a place when a series of explosions occurred. We became separated and we never saw each other again. In 1982 Kim would have been 34 years old. Anyone knowing a person of similar age, please contact, etc."

As we were led through the Plaza of Hope by Mr. Da-wan Pong, the Chairman of the Parliamentary Foreign Affairs Committee, we saw an interview on a nearby television studio of two sisters who had been reunited after 30 years, while outside thousands of people moved from poster to poster in search of something that might lead them to a reunion with their loved ones.

The capital of the Republic of Korea, Seoul, had approximately 400 buildings left standing at the cessation of hostilities in 1953. Today it is a modern, bustling and thriving city of 9 million people. For the casual visitor to this city, it is difficult to perceive the anxiety that the Koreans feel at being just 40 kilometres away from the demilitarized zone, a strip of land 4 kilometres wide acting as a buffer that divides the peninsula into two separate states, North and South Korea. Today there are still some 40,000 American troops stationed in Korea to bolster its defence against a possible invasion from the north. At Panmunjom, where the truce was signed in 1953, the international commission supervises the frequent meetings that take place at the demarcation line between the two opposing forces. Thirty years after the end of hostilities in 1953, the world has mostly forgotten that the Korean people still live with this daily drama.

The Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference came on the heels of the downing of the 747 Korean airliner by the Russians. This tragic event with the loss of 269 lives had a major impact on the conference. The Soviet Union, its allies and close associates, stayed away as a result of this incident. This meant that one of the three major groups of delegations was absent. Tragedy struck again on Sunday October 9 when in Burma an assassination attempt on the President of South Korea resulted in the death of several Korean cabinet ministers, officials and aids. Furthermore, the Korean parliamentarians at the conference numbered the deceased among their personal friends, and the bombing caused them great anguish and distress.

Despite this tragedy, the Korean members expressed their determination to carry on with the conference and, in fact, did so with great dignity. They won the sympathy of the entire gathering, which seemed to feel a genuine respect for the courage they displayed in their time of trouble. During a special two-hour plenary session the following day, the members of a number of visiting delegations expressed their sympathy to the Korean people. Congressman Claude Pepper of the United States, and Dr. Hans Sterchen of the Federal Republic of Germany, spoke on behalf of the Ten-Plus group in very eloquent and moving terms.

The Korean members and their officials worked very hard to host the I.P.U. Conference. It was an important political event for the Korean Parliament and government. They succeeded in overcoming the opposition of the North Koreans, and some of their allies, who had attempted to persuade the Inter-Parliamentary Union and its members to select an alternative venue. In this battle, however, the South Koreans were not alone.

[Senator Bosa.]

They had the overwhelming endorsement of most of the members of the I.P.U. and the Canadian delegation was amongst the foremost in its support of accepting the South Korean invitation to hold the conference in Seoul.

The South Korean attitude was reflected in the hospitality that they extended to the Canadian delegation on their arrival in Seoul and throughout the duration of the conference. At all times it was warm and dignified. As a result, delegates taking part in the debates of the conference invariably prefaced their remarks, as did our Canadian delegates, by congratulating the South Korean organizing committee for the superlative job they had done in preparing such a major event.

The various sessions of the conference dealt with a series of topics, and on many of those topics the Canadian delegation took a leading role. You will be gratified to learn that your colleagues from the Senate were prominent in this work. My own involvement in the conference, in addition to being a rapporteur, related to the drafting of the resolution calling for the strengthening of what should be the world's august organization, the United Nations. My initial involvement with this subject was at a meeting of the delegation here in Ottawa at which topics were discussed before being presented in Rome in 1982 to be considered for future Inter-Parliamentary Union conferences. On that occasion I suggested the discussion of a draft resolution on the strengthening of the United Nations so that it could more effectively deal with international conflicts.

Subsequently, my topic became the subject of substantial work and deliberations at the spring meeting between April 25 and 28 in Helsinki. I believe that the work carried out at the Helsinki meeting was a significant manifestation of the determination of member groups to solve this serious problem that faces mankind. It showed a commitment and an undertaking on their part to work diligently in order to strengthen the only international institution which has the potential of creating a more peaceful and secure future for ourselves and generations to come. This resolution essentially proposed the bolstering of the existing United Nations by limited improvement rather than trying to restructure the entire system. Its details were worked out as a result of the efforts of two committees, namely, the Committee of Political Questions, International Security and Disarmament, and the Committee on Parliamentary Juridical and Human Rights Questions. These two committees met under the chairmanship of Mr. G. Andreotti of Italy and Mr. A. Ghalanos of Cyprus during the Helsinki Conference. They considered 18 memoranda on the subject and 15 proposed draft resolutions by 22 different countries, including Canada, as well as a memorandum and draft resolution presented by Mr. S. Escutia of France. The committees proceeded with a debate on the subject in which 58 speakers participated. They drew attention to the need of reaffirming the principles of the United Nations Charter as well as the urgent necessity to reduce tension in a rapidly deteriorating international situation.

Following the debate, a drafting committee of 11 members was appointed which consisted of delegates from Bulgaria,

Canada, Cyprus, France, India, Mexico, Senegal, Tunisia, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Yugoslavia. This drafting committee elected Mr. Ghalanos of Cyprus as its chairman, and I was elected as the rapporteur to report the work of the drafting committee to the two committees sitting jointly.

In addition, the substance of the draft resolution arrived at in Helsinki contained a preamble that recognized peace as the common goal of mankind and stated that its continued existence was threatened more than ever because of the many recurring conflicts throughout the several regions of the world. The resolution noted that, following the establishment of the United Nations in 1945, it was expected that this institution would play a major role in resolving international disputes as well as in eliminating discrimination, upholding human rights and promoting a new economic order.

The operative part of the resolution urged all people, parliaments and governments to reaffirm their fundamental support for the principles and objectives set out in the original United Nations Charter. Its aim was to enhance the United Nations' capacity to serve as an instrument for the resolution of conflicts and as a forum to which countries could turn for the peaceful solution of the disputes in which they are involved. Specifically, the resolution recommends making greater use of the International Court of Justice and to strengthen the peace-keeping machinery by pursuing the objectives of article 43 of the United Nations Charter.

It specifically recommends expanding the United Nations constituency by including parliamentarians as members of the national delegations to the United Nations' various areas of endeavour and calls for greater opportunity for members of the Inter-Parliamentary Union to contribute to the furtherance of the institution's authority.

When I presented the draft resolution at the Seoul Conference, as rapporteur for the Committee on Political Questions, International Security and Disarmament and the Committee on Parliamentary Juridical and Human Rights Questions, I stressed that the final document, which was agreed to in committee at the Helsinki Conference, had been adopted by consensus. I noted particularly that the preamble emphasized the importance of peace as a necessary condition for the survival of mankind, while the operative section underlined the importance of the United Nations as an international institution.

While its specific recommendations might not be extremely strong, I argued that they were nevertheless substantial. I pointed out that paragraph 10 recommended that the Security Council be strengthened in conformity with the Charter and that paragraph 20 reiterated the need for more co-operation between the Inter-Parliamentary Union and the United Nations by granting the Union appropriate status. I repeated the recommendations that parliamentarians be included as members of national delegations to the United Nations General Assembly, a practice already well established in Canada. Finally, I expressed the hope that the absence of 32 countries from the conference because of the unfortunate KAL aircraft incident would not lead to major changes in the text of the draft resolution agreed to in Helsinki.

At this point I should extend a tribute to one of my colleagues on the Canadian delegation, Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier, who played an important role in the deliberations of the Political Committee on the subject of United Nations reform. The main objective of his remarks was to strengthen the text prepared in Helsinki by adding to the fact-finding machinery of the United Nations and otherwise enhancing the powers of the existing U.N. system without fundamentally altering it. In this, he and others with similar goals were largely successful. One amendment submitted by the Kuwaiti group went further than the proposal made by Mr. Gauthier. It called for the revision of those parts of the U.N. Charter which accord a veto power to the five permanent members of the Security Council. Fortunately, it was not accepted.

In my own role as rapporteur in the Political Committee considering U.N. reform, I had the good fortune to work very closely with the chairman, Mr. Andreotti of Italy. I was able to assist him in outlining the origins and the significance of many important questions that arose, as well as in the resolution of some of the points of contention.

The resolution called for:

Ways and means of strengthening the United Nations so that this world institution could play a more effective role in resolving conflicts and present and future world problems, especially in the field of arms control and disarmament.

When it was presented at the Final Plenary Session of the conference on the afternoon of Wednesday, October 12, 1983, it was adopted without a vote. The sole call for an amendment to operative paragraph 2, by an Italian delegate, was rejected by a massive majority.

Finally, I would like to pay tribute to the Canadian delegation as a whole, which was very active in its work at the conference. In addition to myself, my colleague in the Canadian group, Mr. Prud'homme, acted as the rapporteur in the committee that considered the Iran-Iraq question. Mr. Prud'homme had the distinction of having been chosen a one-man committee to reconcile the two resolutions that had been submitted by Iran and Iraq. It is a credit to Mr. Prud'homme that he had been accepted for this important task by both these countries that are so antagonistic to one another. All Canadian members were involved, either through speaking in the plenary debates or participating in the committee sessions. Mr. Prud'homme and Mr. Lawrence participated actively in the work of the council and the Ten-Plus group.

Mr. Rémi Bujold, speaking on the debate on self-determination, lamented the fact that many countries were still struggling for their independence. Mr. Ian Waddell, intervening in the debate on furthering a more equitable international economic system, emphasized that durable peace has to be based on the reduction of economic disparities. Mr. Douglas Neil and Mr. Michael Landers played an important part in presenting their committee's amendments dealing with international indebtedness of poorer countries and their need for skilled labour. Senator Rowe presented two amendments to the Committee on Education, Science, Culture and Environment, one of which drew attention to the danger of civil disorder and the existence of youth unemployment because the economies of Third World countries could not generate and sustain the industry required to employ young people. Senator Martial Asselin headed the Canadian delegation on the study committee on the decolonization issues, a committee that past experience had shown expresses its feelings in very strong language and advocates positions on many issues which Senator Asselin and other Canadian members could not support because they were either inaccurate or likely to undermine the cause of decolonization rather than promote it.

To this end, then, Senator Asselin, on behalf of the Canadian delegation, cast his one vote for abstention.

The Canadian group met each morning in its delegation room at the Lotte Hotel to review current business and to decide on the positions to be taken that day. At other times, other members worked closely together to review documents and amendments being put before their committees.

Finally, I should pay tribute to the Canadian Ambassador to South Korea, Mr. William Bauer, and his wife, as well as the staff of the embassy, including particularly Mr. Lesley James and Mr. David Hutchings, who ably assisted the committee while they were in Seoul. Ambassador Bauer provided a review of the Korean situation in the briefing for the delegation, while Sergeant Gaudreau of the Canadian U.N. Commission in Korea accompanied the delegates on their visit to Panmunjom, in the demarcation area dividing the peninsula into North Korea and South Korea. I would be remiss in my duty if I did not put in its proper perspective the very able assistance, guidance and counselling that was given to the Canadian delegation by Roger Hill and Martin Lavoie. Without their help and co-operation, the delegation could not have carried out the very important and onerous task that had been assigned to it. Both Messrs. Hill and Lavoie were equally helpful as we journeyed to China at the invitation of the Chinese government and the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs. The objective of the Canadian delegation's visit to China, among others, was to explore the possibility of Chinese membership in the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Complementary to this mission was the delegation's desire to obtain first-hand impressions of the current political and economic issues in China through discussions with senior Chinese officials, as well as to discuss Canadian relations with their country. The length of the delegation's visit was seven days.

● (1540)

The Canadian delegation was impressed by the immensity of China, its enormous potential for influence in world affairs, the frankness of its hosts, their hospitality and their efforts to ensure that the visit was both meaningful and pleasant. Indeed, the members of the Canadian delegation left China with a greater understanding of the Chinese people and a much greater awareness of their current situation and future aspirations. The delegation regarded the visit as an outstanding success.

The delegation arrived in Beijing, the capital of the People's Republic of China, on the evening of October 13, 1983. By coincidence, October 13 was the twelfth anniversary of Canada's recognition of China. After a brief ceremony at the airport, the delegation travelled to the Diao Yu Tai state guest house, where they stayed during their visit to the capital.

In the ensuing days, the program included a briefing by the Canadian Ambassador, Michel Gauvin, who outlined the recent developments in China and the main features of Canadian-Chinese relations, and a meeting with Chinese officials, such as Mr. Han Nianlong, President of the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs, at a reception at the Canadian Embassy. The President subsequently hosted a welcoming dinner in the banquet room of the Great Hall of the People.

The following day the delegation met with Mr. Jia Shi, Vice-Minister of Foreign Economic Relations and Trade, who described China's economic situation and emphasized the importance of Canadian-Chinese trade.

Other activities included a visit to the Temple of Heaven, followed by a lunch and a tour of the Great Hall of the People, China's Parliament. Its main chamber is so immense that it has a seating capacity for approximately 10,000 people. Simultaneous interpretation is provided in 14 languages, in order to accommodate China's many minorities of non-Chinese origin. The ethnic Chinese, however, are required to use Mandarin.

Subsequently the delegation met with Mr. Huang Hua, former Chinese Foreign Minister and now Vice-Chairman of the Standing Committee of the People's National Congress. Mr. Huan Hua is a prestigious figure in China, with a long record of service to his country. He has also the distinction of having served as adviser to Chou En Lai.

The Canadian delegation finished its series of visits by journeying to the Great Wall and the Ming Tombs, which are about a two-hour drive from the capital, and visiting the Imperial Palace. Before leaving the capital, the delegation had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Chou Nan, Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, who, on that occasion, made a brief statement and answered questions from members of the delegation.

The delegation spent almost four days in Shanghai, a city of 11.9 million people, where we were taken on a tour of the giant and costly Baoshan iron and steel complex, the showpiece of China's modernization, where 40,000 workers are employed in construction. Phase one is scheduled to be completed in 1985. On completion, Baoshan is expected to produce annually six million tonnes of iron and an equal amount of steel. The total of Chinese national production in 1982 reached 37 million tonnes. The Baoshan complex is located on the Yangtse River, approximately 40 miles from Shanghai. On the way, the delegation observed miles of industrial suburbs and factories in an area which accounts for approximately one-half of the industrial output of China.

In Shanghai there was a brief meeting with Mr. Liu Nianghi, Vice-Chairman of the Standing Committee of the Shanghai Municipal People's Congress, and some of his colleagues.

On Wednesday, October 19, the delegation divided into two groups, one visiting the Hongqiao People's Commune and the other the Shanghai carpet factory. In the afternoon, the delegation had a tour of Shanghai Harbour by launch, passing approximately 20 to 30 miles of docks, warehouses, shipbuilding yards, industrial plants and oil refineries which line the banks of the Whampoa River. Shanghai Harbour is the number one port and shipbuilding centre of China.

In discussing the organization and operations of the commune system, the representative of the Hongqiao People's Commune revealed that a new approach had been adopted in recent years. The communes now operate on an incentive system which rewards those work teams which put in an extra effort. In fact, this seems to have led to an upsurge in agricultural and other production in the past five years. The Hongqiao People's Commune numbers approximately 27,000 people, 18,000 of whom represent the labour force. They are organized into divisions, brigades and work teams. While agriculture is the main activity, there are other areas of endeavour. We visited a large clothing factory, and some of the garments being completed bore the label "Tip Top".

The tour was not without its cultural events. In the capital, the Canadian delegation attended an acrobatic show, while, in Shanghai, on the evening before our departure from China, we were treated to a concert of traditional dances and music.

There was general agreement that Chinese-Canadian relations had continually improved since their establishment at the beginning of the 1970s, with no major problems on either side. Furthermore, the Chinese and Canadian views on most of the current international problems, with some specific exceptions, were very similar. Interestingly, the Chinese hosts were well aware that the Canadian delegation had come to China immediately following an Inter-Parliamentary Union meeting in Seoul, South Korea, a matter that did not seem to disturb them.

In discussing the possible reunification of the two Korean states, the Chinese leaders pointed out that they did not believe there was any danger of an invasion of the South by the North. The Chinese apparently agree that the division of Korea, which resulted after the Second World War, was not a natural one, and they predicted that sooner or later the two would be reunited. However, China did not believe in admitting two separate Korean states to the United Nations, or that mutual recognition would further this process. Chinese officials believe that it was important to obtain the withdrawal of U.S. forces from the South prior to working toward reunification.

In subsequent questioning of the Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Chou Nan, the delegation underlined the fact that while there seemed to be a similarity of opinion between Canada and China on most international questions, there was evidently a difference of opinion with regard to Korea.

In response, the Vice-Minister pointed out that China had consistently held the view that the division of Korea had been artificially brought about. He said that the situation was unnatural and that China did not believe that it would last; otherwise it would give rise to continued difficulties.

On the question of Taiwan, which apparently was the major issue between China and the United States, the Chinese officials were informed by the Canadian delegation of Canada's attachment to a one-China policy. It was also pointed out that, on a number of occasions, visits to Taiwan made by Canadian parliamentarians, businessmen and others, did not receive the sanction of the Canadian government, the Senate, or the House of Commons.

On the question of Hong Kong, the current Vice-Chairman of the Standing Committee of the People's National Congress, Mr. Huang Hua, and the Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Chou Nan, pointed out clearly that China intended to recover full sovereignty over the area by 1997.

With regard to China's relationship with the Soviet Union, the Chinese officials explained that there were three main barriers to the improvement of relations: the Soviet military build-up on the Sino-Soviet border and in Mongolia, the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, and the Soviet support for Vietnam, including the occupation of Kampuchea, which is threatening to China.

● (1550)

Mr. Huang Hua also provided a summary of China's view on the current world situation. It was couched in very open, frank and straightforward terms. He said that China believed the international situation was becoming more tense and turbulent. He lamented the fact that there was no sign of settlement in the Middle East or of the termination of the Iran-Iraq war. This he blamed particularly on the impact of the superpowers, pointing specifically to the occupation of Afghanistan and the American support of the Israeli expansion. Moreover, China was concerned about the problems in Africa, Latin America, Southeast Asia, Europe and elsewhere where the superpowers have often shown a negative influence. He also took issue with South Africa's apartheid policies and its efforts to destabilize its neighbours as well as its unreasonable attitude toward Namibia and its involvement in Angola. On North Africa, he pointed to the problem of Chad, plus the unequal treatment of some African countries in trade relations with the industrialized world. With regard to Europe and North America, Mr. Huang Hua acknowledged that Canada, being a member of NATO, had a better idea of military confrontation in this area than the Chinese themselves.

The importance of Canadian-Chinese trade was noted on many occasions during the visit, particularly the fact that Canada was now one of China's largest trading partners, with a heavy trade imbalance in Canada's favour. The Vice-Minister of Foreign and Economic Relations and Trade, Mr. Jia Shi, noted the fact that Canada was currently one of China's largest trading partners, preceded only by such countries or groups as Japan, Hong Kong, the European Community and the United States. The massive imbalance in Canada's favour was largely due to China's need for great quantities of wheat, potash, minerals and pulp and paper.

Interestingly, this imbalance did not seem to bother the Chinese officials. For instance, when the delegation attended the banquet hosted by Mr. Liu Nianghi, a position emerged that Canadian business failed to pay adequate attention to the major opportunities of long-term trade expansion. Spokesmen apparently pointed out that while China was a difficult market which required continuous sales efforts over lengthy periods of time, the rewards could be massive in the long-term if the Canadian government and business groups seized the opportunities that were available. More precisely, however, the Chinese did call for a shrinking of the imbalance, pointing out that China's capacity to import depends on its ability to pay, which in turn is linked to its capacity to export.

Grain is the major item which China imports from Canada. Under existing trade agreements it also imports pulp and paper, non-ferrous metals and similar products. Similarly, Canada and China have good contacts in the fields of economic and technological co-operation. A variety of projects have been under negotiation and there are good prospects for technical co-operation in the fields of agriculture, forestry and mining. In response to a question regarding technological co-operation, Mr. Jia Shi pointed out that China had 400,000 enterprises which needed to be technologically transformed and for which it needed Western technology. He even held out the possibility that while China was discussing the acquisition of nuclear reactors with France, the many possibilities in the nuclear field might even permit Canada to export its CANDU reactor.

In the area of technology, Canadian Ambassador Gauvin also mentioned that the National Research Council had recently signed a scientific agreement with the Chinese Academy of Sciences. On a recent visit to Canada, the Chinese Foreign Minister signed an important agreement on aid. This was in addition to the general agreement on trade and development that existed between Canada and China.

In conclusion, the Canadian delegation was very well received. Our Chinese hosts were extremely hospitable and the delegation's visit was both pleasant and meaningful. The delegates greatly appreciated the opportunity to meet with knowledgeable Chinese leaders and officials. They were particularly grateful to Mr. Han Nianlong, President of the Chinese People's Institute for Foreign Affairs, who co-sponsored the visit with the Chinese government. Undoubtedly it was a most worthwhile experience for the Canadian delegation of the Inter-Parliamentary Union to visit China and we are pleased to share our experience with the rest of our colleagues on Parliament Hill.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 17, 1984, at 2 p.m.

(See p. 472)

CANADA'S MARITIME DEFENCE

ADDRESS BY THE HONOURABLE H. A. OLSON, P.C.

Honourable senators, I rise on this occasion to make a statement on the subject of defence. I have discussed the matter with the Minister of National Defence, and I will be speaking on his behalf.

The purpose of my statement is to offer a response to the Second Report of the Sub-committee on National Defence of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled 'Canada's Maritime Defence' which was tabled in the Senate on 15 June 1983.

In his response to the First Report of the Sub-committee, entitled 'Manpower In Canada's Armed Forces' in June of last year, the Honourable Raymond J. Perrault spoke to the right of this house to play a role of increasing importance in the vital area of defence. Indeed, the era of international turbulence he described at that time has been further confirmed by a series of international conflicts some of which unhappily have not been resolved since he spoke. Still others, such as the recent military intervention in Grenada and the tragic shooting down of the Korean airliner, indicate the pervasive nature of the potential threats to world security, so we must all be aware of the awful possibility of escalation sparked by a clash of arms in any of the increasing number of potential conflict areas spread around the world.

Under these circumstances, many Canadians are uncertain as to the best way to reduce the likelihood of war. In recent months, some proposals suggested for this purpose have given rise to widespread but narrowly focused and sometimes acrimonious public debate on matters related to defence policy. On the other hand observations and recommendations, such as those contained in the report, have been instrumental in achieving a broader understanding of the often complex issues involved. The difference has been between the illumination and the clouding of issues. On the one hand we hear the suggestion that weapons are the cause of war. The fact of the matter is that nations arm themselves for essentially political reasons, either because they have external ambitions or because they fear or misunderstand the intentions and actions of adversary states. As the Prime Minister recently put it "We are devoting far too great a proportion of our time to the enumeration of capabilities, and far too little to the intentions which govern the use of arms."

Our aim is still to seek agreements on lower levels of arms but this requires a measure of confidence and trust that has been elusive in international relations in recent years. The seductive shortcut of disarmament by example, which risks everything on the goodwill of an adversary, is neither a logical nor a prudent option in the light of all recent history. Rather, it is vital that peace loving peoples ensure that their determination to defend their security interests is clearly understood, and that the threat of retaliation is made credible by the existence of the means and the demonstration of the will whereby to make such a threat credible.

For years deterrence by threat of nuclear retaliation has provided a cheap answer to the Soviet challenge. However, now that Soviet nuclear parity has made the consequences of a global nuclear exchange totally unacceptable to either of the superpowers, the focus has shifted back to the adequacy of conventional forces to deter an aggressor by convincing him that the venture is not worth the cost.

We, as members of a collective defence alliance, must make sure that we convey to those who might breach the peace that such a course of action would not be worthwhile because we have both the means and the determination to safeguard our security interests. In order to do so, while we continue to pursue with our allies the objective of greater security through arms control negotiations, we must make a tangible contribution to the development of new weapons systems to counter those that have been deployed against us, and we must maintain our agreed levels of commitment to collective defence. Our expressions of solidarity must be backed by material evidence of our determination to meet our agreed defence commitments.

At the same time we must not neglect our own national security requirements. This requires that we maintain forces capable of enforcing our claims to sovereignty, protecting our national interests against terrorism, subversion or economic challenge, and at the same time continue to contribute to international stability by maintaining forces to meet international commitments as agreed from time to time by the government.

Throughout the free world, governments are having to face the difficult problem of providing sufficient resources for the defence of their security interests, while at the same time dealing with social and economic pressures which reflect the world wide economic recession. These circumstances have given rise to a heightened public concern in Canada, as in other countries, with regard to the adequacy of our defences, but not necessarily to informed debate concerning what proportion of the national wealth to devote to this purpose or of how most effectively to allocate the limited resources that can reasonably be made available to achieve the greatest improvement to our defence posture.

In this connection the minister has asked me to thank the Honourable Senator Lafond and the members of his sub-committee for their efforts in bringing these important matters to the attention of the Canadian public. Both of the reports of the Sub-committee on National Defence have focused attention on serious problems faced by the department in providing properly for the defence of Canada. They will be most helpful in determining the appropriate manner to address them within the limited resources that can be made available for this purpose in face of the other competing demands.

The minister considers that the work of the sub-committee continues to be of enormous value. With particular reference to the Second Report on Canada's Maritime Defence, the perceptive and thorough examination of the problem has been most useful in properly identifying deficiencies and that, while the minister has difficulty with some of the conclusions, many of the recommendations are already being actively pursued. Indeed, he would support most of them should adequate funds become available. In any case the minister wishes me to assure the honourable members of the sub-committee that their report is receiving due attention and has already stimulated an active response during its analysis within the department.

Turning then to the specifics of the report, the minister agrees that the need for a renewed, balanced, and fully capable maritime force to meet both national requirements and international commitments is indisputable. In this regard he has observed that many of the recommendations in the report are not far removed from those which military and civilian analysts within the department would make in the absence of funding constraints. However, the recommendation for the creation of such a maritime force by the acquisition of twice as many major weapons platforms as are now possessed by the Maritime Command is not considered to be realistic in considering the optimum allocation of the limited incremental resources that we can expect to be made available for defence.

This critical difference in judgment can be traced to the assumption made in the report that current budgetary plans contain provision for the replacement or updating (or both) of all the equipment currently possessed by the Maritime Command. This assumption fails to recognize that the currently approved funding levels fall some billions of dollars short of the levels that would be necessary over the next 15 years to completely modernize the maritime force at the currently authorized force level. This significant discrepancy is compounded by the assumption that the incremental costs for personnel operations and maintenance incurred by full implementation of the recommendations would be $80 million a year (1983 dollars). This estimate appears to be based on an estimate of the direct incremental personnel costs alone and falls significantly short of the total personnel, operating and maintenance costs that would inevitably be associated with such a major force expansion.

With respect to individual recommendations in the report I should like to offer detailed responses specific to each, because of the complexity of some of the issues and the broad scope of the report.

The first recommendation reiterates one in the January report, that work on a white paper should begin immediately. The recommendation was addressed by the Honourable Raymond J. Perrault in the Senate on 23 June 1982, at which time he observed that white papers have traditionally been used as vehicles whereby Canadian governments have announced policy decisions rather than as mechanisms for stimulating debate. In this instance, since a major change of resource allocation rather than a change of policy is sought, the minister does not consider that a new white paper would necessarily be helpful at this time. Indeed a major policy review associated with it would well divert attention from the issue of adequate resources and their appropriate allocation.

Recommendation No. 2 advocates that the white paper be followed by a firm government commitment to ensure that the required manpower and materiel will be provided according to a definite stated timetable.

In response to this recommendation, the minister would draw attention to the recent governmental decision to maintain the purchasing power of the defence budget after 1986/87 but would also observe that more specific commitments in the out years would run counter to established parliamentary procedures which prescribe the annual debate and approval of defence expenditures.

Recommendation No. 3 recommends that the commitments of the Canadian Armed Forces be recast so as to include specific reference to the defence of Canada.

The minister agrees that the fundamental purpose of the Canadian forces must be the defence of Canada and the security of Canadians as has been reflected in the more recent statements of the missions of Canada's Maritime Forces, which make this point clear.

Recommendation No. 4 reiterates an earlier recommendation that the entire question of the Canadian Air-Sea Transportable Brigade or CAST commitment should be examined by Canada in consultation with Norway, the other Alliance governments and the Alliance military commanders.

With regard to the CAST commitment, the minister notes that arrangements are being made to pre-position some heavy equipment of the brigade group in Norway. This will alleviate the problems of deployment, although it should be noted that escort of reinforcements to Europe is an Alliance rather than a national responsibility and one which we would not be expected to undertake unilaterally.

He would also point out that Canada's entire military contribution to NATO is regularly reviewed as part of the NATO biennial planning cycle.

Recommendations 5 and 6 relate to the specific military tasks assigned to the Canadian Armed Forces and recommend that these be the subject of regular parliamentary debate to enhance public understanding and to strengthen parliamentary control over defence spending. In this regard the minister observes that the broad missions of the Canadian Maritime Forces are better suited than the detailed tasks for the purposes of government decision making.

He also notes that parliamentary control over defence expenditures by means of the cabinet committee system is well suited to the size of the endeavour, which precludes the separate identification of non-DND costs except in the case of major crown projects.

Recommendation No. 7 finds that there is a requirement for Canada's Maritime Forces to be equipped to perform a sea-denial role in waters over which Canada claims jurisdiction.

This requirement is agreed by the minister and recognized in current force development plans.

Recommendation No. 8 relates to Canada's maritime commitments and recommends that the related maritime tasks be subject to continuous review. In fact, this is already the case in as much as the NATO biennial planning cycle provides for regular review of national plans in developing force goals, and in as much as nations are consulted concerning contingency and operational plans including the forces they have agreed to commit to NATO.

Recommendation No. 9 addresses anti-submarine tasking and recommends that Canada's maritime anti-submarine tasking be confined to those of a tactical nature.

In response, the minister notes that normal surveillance systems cannot distinguish between strategic and tactical submarine targets. He therefore considers that the Maritime Forces need the capability to detect both, although there are no plans to develop ASW capabilities solely for strategic purposes.

Recommendation No. 10, that equipment for the Maritime Command be designed primarily with specific wartime tasks in mind is already addressed by the minister's requirement that all capital equipment acquisition programs be substantiated by wartime requirements.

Recommendation No. 11 concerns the practice of regularly seconding Maritime Command personnel to the Coast Guard for practice and training in Arctic navigation. The minister agrees that this practice would have significant potential and has directed that the matter be taken up for further study since the person-year and career implications require careful evaluation.

Recommendation No. 12 proposes that incremental funding, in addition to that required to replace current equipment, in the amount of $550 million per year—1983 constant dollars—be dedicated to the acquisition of new capital equipment.

As I have already stated, these calculations are based on the assumption that planned funding already makes provision for the replacement or updating, or both, of all the equipment currently possessed, which is far beyond the capability of projected funding even given continued real growth at a rate of 3 per cent in the defence envelope. The problem is rather to determine the most productive marginal investment of the resources that can realistically be expected to be made available.

Recommendation No. 13, relates to a series of capital programs listed in priority, which should be undertaken to recreate a balanced fleet.

The minister notes that most of the recommendations are already the subject of detailed staff proposals, but that each must compete for the limited funds available. However, the minister is satisfied that we are making good progress towards revitalizing our Maritime Forces and he would have me advise honourable senators that a follow-on to the CPF is under active consideration as our next major acquisition program.

Recommendation No. 14 deals with studies concerning the tactical air support of maritime operations and the arming of merchant vessels for convoy escort duties.

The minister notes that the number of CF 18 aircraft we have contracted to purchase are already fully committed to the air defence and ground attack roles. While these aircraft and the other aircraft in our inventory could be modified to carry air-to-surface missiles, the detailed study of such proposals would involve classified allied data and so could not be released for public debate.

Canada continues to monitor closely allied studies for the modification of merchant shipping, but the minister considers it would be premature to pursue in-house studies of such programs before Canada has firm plans to re-acquire an ocean-going merchant fleet.

Recommendation No. 15 suggests that the government lengthen its perspective on military procurement and favour series production. The minister is pleased to report that these recommendations are being pursued with vigour.

Recommendation No. 16 calls for the separate identification of costs incurred by DND for purposes other than defence.

The minister observes that the preparation of estimates, the allocation of funds, and ongoing management and reporting are already extremely complex because of the size of the department. For these reasons, it would be impractical to segregate the costs specified in the case of most budgets with the exception of major crown projects.

Recommendations 17, 18 and 19 deal with the problems of alleviating the sea-shore ratio, the requirement to accelerate the rate of increase in the Maritime Command's authorized personnel establishment, and the wearing of naval rank and trade insignia. The minister is pleased to report that action is in hand on each of these recommendations although the rate of growth is limited by the funds available and the capacity of the training facilities.

Recommendations 20, 23, 24, 25 and 26 deal with detailed changes to the naval reserves and the requirement for improved mobilization plans.

The minister is pleased to report that major initiatives are already being taken to revitalize the naval reserves and to develop revised mobilization plans. In addition, he has directed that related activities be emphasized during forthcoming exercises, and has caused studies to be initiated with respect to the necessary changes in legislation.

Recommendations 21 and 22 deal with the acquisition of improved training aids for the naval reserves, the requirement to upgrade the accommodation at the existing units, and the requirement to acquire suitable reserve training vessels.

While the minister recognizes the urgency of these requirements as an integral part of Canada's Maritime Force structure, when considered in competition with other pressing demands essential to the combat effectiveness of the fleet, these requirements are not considered to be of sufficient priority to warrant funding out of the limited resources available at this time. A proposal is under consideration, however, to acquire replacement training vessels of a multi-role type built to a standard commercial design, amenable to series production in small Canadian yards. Secondly, the feasibility and cost of opening two new reserve divisions in Quebec is under study as announced by the previous minister last July.

Recommendation No. 27 deals with the status, during a crisis or war, of Canadian vessels operating under foreign flag, and recommends that the matter be referred to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for study and report. The thrust of this recommendation has already been partly addressed in my previous remarks relating to armed merchant vessels. However, the minister would also note the importance of having appropriate plans prepared so that ships registered in Canada can be readily taken up from trade when duly authorized under the pertinent section of the National Defence Act.

Recommendation No. 28 deals with the suitability of shipping belonging to other government maritime agencies for modification to naval use.

The minister acknowledges that the utility of other government shipping for military use could be significantly enhanced by relatively modest design changes. The matter of separate funding for such changes presents certain problems. Nevertheless, the recommendation will be made on the subject of further study within the department.

Recommendation No. 29 concerns the mobilization of non-military resources.

The minister is supportive of this suggestion which, however, lies outside the direct purview of his department. It is suggested that Emergency Planning Canada would be an appropriate agency to coordinate the necessary activity.

Recommendation No. 30 recommends government examination of the need for a year-round base in the Arctic. The minister agrees with the finding of the sub-committee that the Coast Guard can be expected to carry out the great bulk of the Canadian maritime tasks in the Arctic, particularly during peacetime. Nevertheless, he notes that the requirement for forward basing as part of the arrangements for the air defence of North America is under active study within the department.

Recommendation No. 31 suggests that the Canadian Armed Forces continue to be assigned search and rescue as a major task.

In response to this recommendation, the minister is pleased to note the close cooperation that already exists between the government departments responsible for providing an effective search and rescue organization, and would cite the degree of cooperation with the Coast Guard exemplified by the smooth operation of the rescue coordination centers. In addition, the department is already closely engaged in forming the Volunteer Civil Air Search and Rescue Association.

Recommendation No. 32 concerns the requirement for a study of the supply of strategic materials vital to Canada.

The minister notes that there is a study underway by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources into the issue of strategic materials and that the Department of National Defence is contributing.

In conclusion, the minister emphasizes the valuable contribution made by the honourable members of the sub-committee to ensuring that the problems associated with properly providing for the defence of Canada's maritime interests are widely debated and clearly understood. The need for a renewed balanced and fully capable maritime force is indisputable. The problem lies in addressing the gap between these requirements and the resources that can be made available to meet them in competition with other equally pressing demands for the security and well-being of all Canadians. Informed public debate is essential to the optimum allocation of resources, and the Senate sub-committee continues to play a vital role in the deliberate consideration of pressing defence issues.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, April 17, 1984

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (GERALD HARVEY FUDGE AND AUDREY MARIE SAUNDERS; LOUIS PHILIPPE NADEAU AND MARIE THÉRÈSE RITA BRULÉ; ERNEST HODEL AND NORMA DORA LAURIE; BENJAMIN JOSSEPH ANDRADE AND HEATHER WINNIFRED ANDRADE; JUAN ANDRADE AND EMILIA RODRIGUEZ; HENRI PATRY AND ALDÉA BÉA PITT; JOSEPH ROLAND RÉJEAN DAOUST AND MARIE LISE SYLVIE GIRARD; AND PEARL KIM LEE AND THOMAS SIEGFRIED WIELAND)—
COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-2 to S-9, inclusive, to provide an exemption from the public general law relating to marriage, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bills without amendment.

CANADA HEALTH BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Tuesday, April 17, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology presents its

THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-3, intituled: "An Act relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services provided under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof", has in obedience to its order of reference of Thursday, April 12, 1984, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jacques Hébert, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time later this day.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS

INVITATION TO PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday, May 9, 1984, I will move:

That whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a Committee of the Senate in which in the opinion of such Committee, a province or provinces have a special interest, then as a general policy, the government of such province or provinces where in the opinion of the Committee it is practicable to do so, shall be asked by the Committee as to whether or not they wish to make written and/or verbal representations to the Committee, and any province that replies in the affirmative shall be given a reasonable opportunity to do so.

Honourable senators will remember that I moved a similar motion in the last session. This is in the same wording except that I make it clear that it is up to the committee to decide whether a province or provinces have a special interest, and whether it is practicable to ask them if they wish to make representations.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Honourable senators, I will explain if leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Could we have some explanations?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, under the current informal rules concerning committee meetings, the leadership on both sides of the House and the committee chairmen have agreed not to schedule more than one committee meeting while the Senate is sitting.

Today, under those rules, both the chairman of the Transport Committee and the chairman of the National Defence Committee required permission. Accordingly, I asked those chairmen to settle the matter, because no more than one committee may be summoned while the Senate is sitting.

The two chairmen agreed. The chairman of the Committee on National Defence convinced the chairman of the Committee on Transport to meet during today's Senate sitting.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: The Committee on Energy and Natural Resources will also be sitting today.

Senator Frith: Later this afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Asselin: First, we have no objection that Senator Langlois, as Chairman of the Committee on Transport and Communications, agreed to the other committee sitting, so long as the rules and understandings are complied with.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO ADJOURN FROM PLACE TO PLACE IN THE UNITED STATES

Hon. Léopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which was authorized by the Senate on 19th January, 1984, to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada, Inc., be empowered to adjourn from place to place in the United States for the purpose of such inquiry.

He said: Honourable senators will, no doubt, be interested in the contents of a letter which I received yesterday from Amtrak. It reads as follows:

• (1410)

Dear Senator Langlois:

It was a pleasure meeting with you and other members of the Senate Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. I hope that your inspections of Amtrak's Chicago Yard and Beech Grove facility, as well as our discussions in Washington were found to be useful.

You may recall that Amtrak will be inaugurating a new service between Mobile, Alabama and New Orleans, Louisiana later this month. This new route will be implemented with the funding assistance of the States of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama under a section of Amtrak's law which allows states to cost share in the operation of additional trains. In order to fully explain this program and complete last week's series of meetings and demonstrations, Amtrak would like to invite the Senators and staff of the Senate Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to ride with us on a special inaugural train between Mobile and New Orleans on Saturday, April 28, 1984.

The inaugural train will be operated to generate public awareness of this new service. The day's events will begin with a ceremony at the Mobile train station at 9:00 a.m. The train will leave promptly at 9:30 a.m., carrying invited guests only. Ceremonies will be held at each intermediate station, however, guests on-board the train will not be able to attend these ceremonies because of time constraints. Arrival at New Orleans is scheduled for 2:55 p.m., at which time guests will be transported to the World's Fair site for a reception.

If you, your fellow Senate Committee members, or staff are able to attend, please let me know so that I may mail the appropriate tickets. I look forward to your response.

Sincerely,

JIM BARBER

Director,

Intergovernmental Affairs

Hon. Martial Asselin: How many senators are going on the trip?

Senator Langlois: There will be six or seven at the most.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I suppose you will come back by plane.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BRITISH COLUMBIA

NORTHEAST COAL DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Social Development, and it concerns coal development in British Columbia.

While I do not necessarily expect him to have this information at hand, will he inquire and report to this chamber on how much public money has been expended to assist the northeast coal project both directly and indirectly insofar as roads, railways and ports are concerned?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): I would point out to Senator Muir that the ministerial responsibility for the government's involvement in ports, rail and other assistance to the northeast coal project in British Columbia is not mine. However, to provide information of the kind that Senator Muir seeks, I will perhaps ask my colleague, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to furnish an answer.

I believe honourable senators are aware that the federal government has made an important contribution to the northeast coal development particularly in relation to the construction of a coal port terminal at Prince Rupert known as Ridley Island Terminals. This is 90 per cent owned by the National Harbours Board, now called Ports Canada.

In addition, the Canadian National Railway has undertaken an important program of upgrading its main line in order to carry coal from the connection with the British Columbia Railway. I believe that there has been assistance in the form of housing under the aegis of the CMHC to the community of Tumbler Ridge. I know that the Ministry of Transport provided a grant of $5 million towards electrification of the B. C. Railway line from Tumbler Ridge to the main line.

However, with respect to assistance given to Quintette Coal itself, which, as I understand it, is a subsidiary of Denison Mines, I will have to make inquiries.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I thank the minister for his detailed report, especially since he had not been given notice of my question. Although he may not be directly responsible, I directed my question to him because he is the Minister of State for Social Development and I thought that this subject might come under that great umbrella. I am fully in favour of anything that can improve social development in British Columbia or in Cape Breton. Because I do not want the Leader of the Government to think that I overlooked him, perhaps I might involve him, as well as the Minister of State for Social Development, in the response to my supplementary question.

Would either minister indicate to the Senate how much employment is related to the Quintette development? How much foreign exchange does Canada expect to realize annually from the sales of Quintette coal? Further, would the Leader of the Government enumerate for us, at his first opportunity, any guarantees that Canada has received from the Japanese concerning minimum quantities and price in connection with coal purchases? Finally, when they have an opportunity to bring a report back, would either minister indicate whether it is the government's view that these guarantees will be sufficient to keep the Quintette development in operation over the long term?

I do not want honourable senators to think that I am opposed to any development in British Columbia. On the contrary, it is nice to see that the government is helping out the west coast coal industry. However, I hesitate to appreciate the comments of those who are harshly critical of assistance to the Cape Breton coal industry.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was the minister responsible for economic development, and, indeed, was the chairman of a special or ad hoc committee of cabinet while the arrangements were being made for this large and important development in northern British Columbia. As I recall, there was a price set for the coal so that the coal companies, including Quintette, could, over a reasonable period of time, amortize the cost of the investment by the federal government for the Ridley Island terminal, the coal port and all of the other shipping facilities that were put in place. It is also true, I believe, that certain guarantees were undertaken by the purchasers of coal at the time so that the amortization could take place. However, since that time there has been a significant change in the international marketplace for both metallurgical and thermal coal. Therefore, it will be necessary to make some inquiries to find out whether all of the terms and conditions and the circumstances relating to those terms and conditions are as valid today as they were at that time. I know that there has been a serious decline in the situation respecting international coal markets.

OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

VACANCY

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the appointment of the Comptroller General. Since Mr. Harry Rodgers was appointed Deputy Minister of National Revenue—and as we know, Mr. Harry Rodgers was the first Comptroller General—the position is now open. That position is very important. It would be urgent that someone be appointed as soon as possible. Last week, during a meeting with the members of the Institute of Canadian Chartered Accountants, I was given two copies of letters dated April 5. One was sent to the Right Hon. Mr. Trudeau, the other to the Hon. Mr. Gray. They stressed the urgency of appointing a new Comptroller General. The letters included an offer by the Institute, to take part in the appointing process as is the case whenever the Auditor General is appointed, so that a wise selection may be made for such an important position. Could the Minister inform me of the latest developments regarding that appointment?

● (1420)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for giving me notice of his question and copies of the letters to which he has referred. I received a notice of his question a few days ago, and therefore I should have been in a position to respond today. However, I have to advise that I am unable to provide him with any additional information concerning the status of the appointment or precisely what the situation is at the moment.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION FUND

PAYMENTS TO PRODUCERS

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I am aware that the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat

Board has announced the initial price of wheat, oats and barley. However, many farmers are critical of the price suggested. Has the minister any comment to make in that regard?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, last Friday I announced the new initial prices for wheat, oats and barley that will take effect on August 1. The export market is highly competitive. The outlook, in the judgment of the Canadian Wheat Board, is that because of the competition, there is a possibility that world prices will be soft, particularly for spring wheat. With that outlook in mind, and in the judgment of those who provide me with advice on such matters, it was felt that there should be a decrease in the initial price of spring wheat of $10 per tonne at the beginning of August and a decrease of $5 per tonne for Durum wheats, compared with the initial price that was set a year ago.

The world feed grain market, particularly because of the widespread drought that occurred in the United States last year, is more buoyant than the wheat market. Therefore I was able to recommend and have accepted an increase in the initial price of feed oats of $20 per tonne, and, for designated oats, of $10 per tonne; also an increase in feed barley prices of $10 per tonne. Those prices also compare with those of a year ago.

I wish to point out to honourable senators that although these initial prices have been announced at this level, should there be a change in the world market outlook and world prices to the extent that, say, spring wheat prices increase substantially between now and August 1, or soon after, I would be prepared to recommend to my colleagues an adjustment to the price announced either before or after August 1.

I should remind honourable senators that the Wheat Board marketing system is based on the proposition that the initial price should be set at a reasonable proportion of what the market is likely to bring, and, in the minds of the board, of producers and others, it is felt that an initial price of from 70 per cent to 80 per cent of the current market outlook is probably fair and reasonable. The idea behind it is that the initial price is moderately safe, is based on the current outlook and gives the Wheat Board an operating margin in which it can adjust its prices, either upward or downward, in relation to world prices without setting prices from time to time that are below the initial price. Of course, if the board has to go at any time below the initial price, then the guarantee of the treasury comes into play. It seems to me that it is good business to set a price as high as possible in relation to market conditions but still at a level that gives the Wheat Board a reasonable operating margin in the world market. If we should change our philosophy, and I am not in favour of it,—although, apparently, some farm leaders think that it is a new philosophy that should be adopted—that once an initial price is adjusted upward, whether it be barley, durum or whatever, it should never come down, and that the initial price should not be based on the world market outlook but on economic conditions and costs at home. If we followed this course and set initial prices that are not related to the world market but are high in relation to it and set out levels that are likely to cost the treasury large sums of money, then I think the whole Wheat Board marketing concept will be brought into question and all those who from time to time oppose the Wheat Board system will come out of the woodwork and say, "The Wheat Board misjudged the market, the Wheat Board led the taxpayers down the garden path and it is costing the taxpayers huge sums of money." I think it would jeopardize the position of the Canadian Wheat Board. Basically, the Wheat Board would be in a conflict of interest situation if the initial price were set at a level that would mean that the Wheat Board was selling at a level that would cost the treasury money. If the cost to the treasury were substantial, then the Department of Finance and the Canadian Wheat Board would obviously be in a conflict over taxpayers' money, and this would make the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board very difficult, if not impossible.

This does not mean that the Government of Canada and the taxpayers should not take action with regard to the economic position of the wheat and grain producers in western Canada. However, let us bear in mind that today exports are still running 5 per cent ahead of last year and that last year's exports set an all time record. Even car-unloads at the ports are running fractionally higher than last year. If farmers need support, I suggest—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Are you making a statement?

Senator Argue: I would think that it is a statement; I hope that it is.

Senator Asselin: May I have a copy of it?

Senator Argue: I have a copy of the formal statement. The statement I am making today—

Senator Asselin: Statements are not made during Question Period.

Senator Argue: I have been around the Senate a long time—

Senator Asselin: There is a time and there are rules with regard to statements.

Senator Argue:—this is Question Period and Senator Guay, a distinguished colleague of the distinguished Senator Asselin, has very properly asked an important question. That question and what we are doing affects the livelihood of western farmers and has an effect on the entire Canadian economy. I think Senator Asselin should hear what I have to say.

Senator Asselin: I am ready to hear what you have to say but I would like a copy of the statement.

Senator Guay: You are getting an explanation.

Senator Argue: The Honourable Senator Asselin hears very well, is very intelligent—I wish I had the facility in French that he has in English—and he knows exactly what I am saying. I invite him to make a statement when I sit down so we can hear his remarks on this very important question.

I was about to say that I feel that if action is necessary to support the incomes of western grain producers, it should be done under another program, under the Western Grain Stabilization Act, which, I think, is the appropriate mechanism to bring about the kind of support that farmers may require.

• (1430)

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. With farmers facing a lower return for this crop year, is the minister any more highly motivated than he has been to date with respect to introducing amendments to the Western Grain Stabilization Act which would permit the government to respond more appropriately to the agricultural circumstances than it is able to do at the moment?

Senator Argue: That is a very good question from Senator Bielish, and one which I welcome.

The answer is that I, along with my other colleagues in cabinet, including two other distinguished senators, have been working very hard so that we could introduce in this session of Parliament appropriate amendments to the Western Grain Stabilization Act which would make it possible for western producers to receive a very substantial payout in this calendar year. While I am not able to make any definitive response to the question today by way of an announcement, I can say once again that I am fully confident that my colleagues are responding to the recommendations which have been made and that a favourable announcement will be made in due course.

THE BUDGET

YOUTH AND OPPORTUNITY FUND

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised by Senator Roblin on February 21, 1984. At that time he requested a report with respect to what has happened under the Youth Opportunity Fund, the purpose of which is to assist young people to acquire new skills and to find jobs. The answer to his enquiry is fairly long and I propose that it be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Funding under the Youth Opportunity Fund for 1983-84 totalled some $1.1 billion.

Of the total amount of funding, $478.9 million was for job creation; $498.6 million for training and $145 million for employment services.

Job creation funding provided employment opportunities for some 169,400 young people and the training component enabled 138,400 youth to participate in the training programs of the Employment and Immigration Commission.

Training can apply to all skills for which there is a current or anticipated labour market demand and which fall within the mandate of the National Training Act.

The four consolidated job creation programs provide opportunities to learn or enhance relevant job skills; however, Job Corps and Career-Access are particularly designed for human resource development. The focus under Job Corps is on preparing severely employment-disadvantaged youth for participation in the labour market. Thus, the skills developed are in such areas as resume preparation, interview techniques, personal development, and work habits. The more work-related skills will vary from one Job Corps project to another and these involve a wide range of activities. Career-Access, a wage subsidy program, provides funds for a wide variety of jobs in all sectors of the economy.

The employment services component applies to more than two million Canadian youth and provides funding for Canada Employment Centres (CECs) on Campus and CECs for Students as well as regular CECs. Specialized Youth Units, Outreach Projects, the Mobility Program and Native Internship are also funded.

NOVA SCOTIA

GLACE BAY—FIRE IN MINE NO. 26

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised by Senator Muir on April 11, 1984, concerning the fire that took place in Mine No. 26 at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia. It is a fairly long answer and I would ask that it be incorporated into the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, the immediate crisis has been brought under control, through the highly commendable actions of the Corporation, its workers and officials of the various federal and provincial government agencies involved. However, it will be some time yet before the damage can be surveyed and assessed. Until that has been done, it would be premature to indicate when the No. 26 colliery might be reopened.

It is the responsibility of the Minister of Labour to determine whether a formal enquiry is warranted. This determination cannot be made, however, until the inspectors have had an opportunity to make a physical investigation of the area in which the fire occurred. This will take some time yet, until it is judged safe to do so.

As to government plans to relieve the hardship this disaster will have caused for the workers at Devco, this is an extremely difficult question to answer, because there is so much uncertainty at present. A major difficulty is that we still do not know the extent of the fire damage at No. 26, and how long it will be until the mine reopens. The longer the mine remains out of production, the more extensive is the range of initiatives governments—federal and provincial—must consider. A second problem is the difficulty of attracting new industry to Cape Breton, which has historically suffered chronically high unemployment rates. Third, the Cape Breton Development Corporation is already costing the government over $100 million per year.

These are very real difficulties, but they will not inhibit the efforts of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Industrial Expansion, and those of my colleagues, to reduce the severe consequence of this problem. It is too early to announce specific measures, but the Minister hopes he can do so over the coming weeks.

The government's first priority, in this regard, is to complete the analysis of the impact of the fire on the rest of the operations and the workforce of the Corporation. In doing this analysis, the Corporation will be examining very carefully the extent to which it can utilize the affected workers in its other operations. Beyond that, the government will have to examine all possibilities to alleviate the hardships being faced.

CANADA HEALTH BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Jacques Hébert moved the third reading of Bill C-3, relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services provided under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence thereof.

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin began his remarks on second reading of the proposed Canada Health Act by saying that since all the big guns had spoken on the bill there was very little left for him to say. When I considered the effect of Senator Roblin's suggestion that the bill be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, I came to the conclusion that he fired what is known in artillery language as a blank charge. I have no anticipation that my remarks of a lighter calibre will achieve any other result than a negative vote. However, I will proceed with my remarks in the hope that the light may possibly dawn.

The origins of Bill C-3 are rather interesting. Since the last election various cabinet ministers have attempted for some specific reasons to hold the limelight; others held the limelight when they really did not wish to be in it.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare was among those seeking to retain the limelight but, in spite of her best efforts, she sank into a morass of oblivion and realized that she would have to do something to come out of that oblivion. She was completely forgotten. Her consultants and political advisors suggested that she concentrate on the proposed Canada Health Act in order that she would come out of the bog and into the fog of the Liberal leadership. They also advised her that there is only one way to shine in the Liberal Party, and that is to quarrel with the provinces. Initiate a fight with the provinces and, overnight, you become a star in the Liberal Party.

The minister then proceeded in that fashion, hoping that the introduction of the Canada Health Bill would meet with severe opposition in the House of Commons. She was disappointed in this regard, because the Conservatives reiterated their support for the principles of medicare. With that opportunity lost, the minister then introduced, in committee, a number of amendments which altered the basis of the bill, and the basis on which she had discussed it individually with the provincial ministers of health. It is on that premise that I will be making my remarks today in an attempt to present the case for the provinces.

Prior to the February snowstorm, the Minister of National Health and Welfare had been accusing the provinces of misappropriating block-funding for other purposes. Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, in his commitment for renewal, said that there was no evidence that any funds destined for medicare or higher education had been diverted to other purposes by the provinces. I hope that that will end the accusations that the federal government has been levelling at the provinces.

Senator Hébert, in his introduction of the bill, presented a very loyal case for the minister and her actions. His loyalty did not surprise me, nor do I condemn him for it. I would probably have done the same thing, had I been in his position. However, there are two ministers in particular who will require an extensive defence and these are the Minister of National Revenue and the minister responsible for the CDIC. I would suggest to both those ministers that they utilize the services of Senator Hébert. He will present their case as they see it and, what is even more remarkable, he will sound as if he believes it.

The title of the bill specifies "cash contributions by Canada in respect of extended health care services." Honourable senators, that is a rather intriguing title in that the bill does not provide any cash payments nor does it extend the health services. It merely combines the old Hospital Insurance Diagnostic Services Act and the Medicare Act. True, it makes provision for penalties for extra-billing and user fees, and imposes certain other restrictions on the provinces. Essentially that is the proposed Canada Health Act.

The preamble states, amongst other things, that the bill "will promote such physical, and mental health and such protection against disease." Then the bill proceeds to exclude mental hospitals from its provisions. That is rather strange in that usually persons confined to a mental hospital are considered to be ill and often require extensive hospitalization. It is rather unfair to exclude those people from the provisions of the bill, except in the lengthy preamble to the bill.

Chronic care patients are also excluded from the provisions of the bill. The attitude of the government seems to be that it is all right to have the mumps or some other illness that will be cured in a week or so, but if a person suffers from a stroke and requires extensive hospitalization, that person is on his own or is the sole responsibility of the provinces.

The report of the committee stated that the title "Canada Health Act" in itself was a misnomer, and that part of the report I heartily endorse. The proposed Canada Health Act will not save one life; it will not produce one cure; and no one will receive any alleviation from his or her suffering.

The lack of funding has been of concern to a number of us and to the provinces. During a meeting of the committee I asked the minister what extra funding was being provided. After a lengthy answer she finally admitted that there was no extra funding provided in the bill. That, honourable senators, creates a problem; there is no extra funding provided for in this bill.

The question of the percentage of the health care bill paid by the federal government and the provinces was a source of contention in the House of Commons, in the Senate, and throughout committee meetings of both houses. That problem arises as a result of the interpretation. The federal government interprets health care as being only hospital and medicare. The provinces include such services as air ambulances, ambulances, and, in some provinces, drugs for the elderly. Two sets of figures have been used, one stating the case for the provinces, the other the case for the federal government. Use whichever set of figures you prefer, the fact remains that the federal government's share of health care costs has gradually been declining. In Alberta that amounts to 32 per cent of the total health care cost, and in Ontario, 41 per cent. Since 1979, the contribution to Ontario has declined from 49 per cent to 41 per cent.

I should like to take a moment and review the funding of the medicare and hospitalization. Various ministers of finance have been drawing the attention of Parliament and the public to the high cost of medicare. Mr. MacEachen and Mr. Lalonde both stated that the provinces ought to move to restrict the cost of medicare and hospitalization. While the federal government was attempting to have the provinces restrict their expenditures, it was reducing its own expenditures.

The Supplementary Estimates for 1981 removed $294.7 million from the Hospitalization Insurance Diagnostic Services Act. In 1982 the federal government, through the removal of the revenue guarantee component, removed $500 million from the 1982-83 budget for medicare. The actual figure was closer to $900 million. From 1983 to 1985, EPF figures are $5 billion lower than the previous estimate, yet the Minister of Health and Welfare suddenly picked up this figure of $150 million in extra billing and user fees. That is now the most important figure in the whole medicare set-up. People have said it is exorbitant, it is atrocious and should not be allowed to happen, yet no one has mentioned the $6 billion that she, as the minister, has removed from this program since 1980. I find it very strange that honourable senators who can be so shocked at a $6.00 emergency fee do not even blink an eye over $6 billion. They can approve and applaud the budgets that removed the $6 billion, but say that no $6.00 emergency fee should be charged. Surely there is something wrong with that logic.

The minister, in an effort to build up her case for Bill C-3, spent millions of dollars on advertising to the effect that medicare was being eroded. She commissioned survey after survey. I should like to read into the record the figures obtained from one survey. This survey was commissioned by the minister herself and she selected the questions that were to be asked. There were six questions. The recipient was asked to rate the questions as matters of "concern" or "no concern". The first question was on unemployment, and 73 per cent stated that it was a matter of concern; the second question was about crime in the streets, and 58 per cent stated that it was a matter of concern; the third question was about protection of the environment, and 51 per cent stated it was a matter of concern; the fourth question was on the cost of electricity, and 49 per cent said that it was a matter of concern; the fifth question was about the cost of health care, apart from taxes, and 41 per cent thought it was a matter of concern; the sixth question related to the ability to obtain health care, and 31 per cent stated that it was a matter of concern.

I point out, honourable senators, that the last question, the ability to obtain health care, could be interpreted in many different ways: It could be the ability to get admission to a hospital; it could be the ability to get the services of a qualified physician, such as the chairman of the committee. The question did not mention user fees. Again I emphasize that this was conducted after the minister spent millions of dollars advertising her case.

Senator Thériault, in replying to a question put to him by Senator Flynn the other day, was concerned about the premiums being charged by the provinces. He thought it was unfair that a person earning $10,000 a year should be charged the same premium as a person earning $30,000 a year.

Honourable senators, last weekend I filled my car's gas tank with gasoline. I noticed that there was leaded, unleaded and super unleaded gas being sold, but there was no difference in the taxation. There is not one tax for someone earning $10,000 a year, another tax for someone earning $20,000 a year, or another tax for someone earning $50,000 a year. The federal government has the same tax on all users. If it is such a crime for a province to have a universal premium, I would expect that the federal government would have different rates of taxation on their various sources of taxation such as gasoline.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, I should like to spend a little time on clause 12(2), which refers to binding arbitration. We discussed that at some length this morning in committee. I realize that I cannot do justice to this the way Senator Tremblay did this morning so I will make my remarks brief. I want the record to note that Mr. Justice M. Hall, speaking in Winnipeg two weeks ago, said that clause 12(2) established binding arbitration for the doctors. I asked the minister about that this morning and she replied that she could not speak for Mr. Justice Hall. She said that he was the father of medicare and a Conservative and that I should speak to him. I accept that reply because she emphasized that medicare was fathered by the Conservative Party, and I thank her for her honesty in that regard.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Who was the mother?

Senator Phillips: I recall the late Judy LaMarsh saying that medicare was her baby, so I suppose we would have to describe her as the mother.

Representatives of the provinces appeared before the Senate committee, and I point out to honourable senators that they came before us not in a cantankerous, controversial manner. They presented their views and asked the Senate to consider them. I am going to refer briefly to a few of their concerns.

Ontario and at least one other province stated that binding arbitration was an intrusion into labour relations, which is a field of provincial responsibility. I also want the record to show that the Minister of Health for Ontario said that the federal minister, when visiting him to explain Bill C-3, said that she would seek a more neutral approach to the matter of arbitration. It certainly was not the opinion of the provinces that she amended the act to provide for a more neutral approach.

The matter of arbitration raises a point that deserves further consideration before honourable senators cast their vote. The Deputy Minister of Health in Ontario stated that the arbitration principle was, in fact, a disincentive to cease extra-billing. I questioned the minister on that point in committee and his reply was to the effect that it is quite possible for a province such as Ontario, where extra billing totals $49 million per year, to receive an arbitration settlement costing the province $150 million a year. Therefore, the province would want to disregard the extra billing and save itself $100 million per annum.

The provinces also expressed concerns about funding. In particular, British Columbia stated their case to the effect that they may have to restructure their whole program, particularly if premiums are prohibited. Presently, the premiums bring in revenue to the provincial government of approximately $370 million per year. The other user fees and charges levied by the provincial government would bring the total close to $500 million. The federal contribution to British Columbia is approximately $500 million. The Minister of Health of British Columbia merely asked why would they want to continue within the plan, and I think that is a point that has to be considered.

The Province of Quebec complained that certain plans they now have would be removed. As I understand it, that province does not pay for drugs prescribed in the emergency department. They use that money to provide drugs for the elderly. That would have to be changed, and the province feels, and I think quite rightly, that that is an unjustified intrusion into their provincial affairs.

The provinces from Atlantic Canada expressed concern that certain aspects of the Hall report, Committal for Renewal, were accepted, but that the federal government ignored the recommendation of the Hall report in that there is no extra funding provided for the Atlantic provinces. And that, honourable senators, was a very clear recommendation in the Hall report.

The provinces accepted the principle of visibility. They have no disagreement with the principle that the federal government should receive recognition for their contribution. However, the question still remains as to whether Alberta's share is 86/14 or whether the federal government pays 32 per cent. This morning in committee the question was raised as to whether or not certain provincial documents will now have to be changed.

Following the presentation of the brief by the provincial ministers of health, the chairman suggested that the bill be passed and that a special committee be set up to study health care matters. The provinces did not agree to that because they felt that the bill should be delayed and then the committee should begin its hearings. I suggested to the provincial representatives that the bill be delayed for one year during which time the federal and provincial ministers of health could meet in an effort to solve the problem, and that if no agreement was reached the bill would go into effect on April 1, 1985. Every province accepted that suggestion, honourable senators, and that will be the basis of my amendment.

The provinces are presently aware of the contents of the bill. They are aware that my proposed amendment would bring the bill into effect on April 1, 1985, unless there is consensus of agreement to change the bill before that time.

The provinces are willing to attend a federal-provincial conference on Bill C-3. All they have asked for is understanding and consideration of their problems. They have the same problems as does the federal Minister of Health. She has told us that behind every minister of health is a minister of finance, and that applies at the provincial level as well as at the federal level. We must recognize the accuracy of her statement.

Honourable senators, I move:

That this bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended by:

(1) replacing subclause 4 of clause 20 with: "No amount may be deducted under subsection (1) or (2) in respect of extra-billing or user charges in the period between April 1, 1985 and June 30, 1985."; and

(2) replacing clause 34 with: "This Act shall come into force on April 1, 1985."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Hébert, seconded by the Honourable Senator Le Moine, that this bill be read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Muir, that this bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended by:

(1) replacing subclause 4 of clause 20 with: "No amount may be deducted under subsection (1) or (2) in respect of extra-billing or user charges in the period between April 1, 1985 and June 30, 1985."; and

(2) replacing clause 34 with: "This Act shall come into force on April 1, 1985."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators —

Senator Phillips: I should like to speak on the amendment for a moment.

Senator Frith: Certainly.

Senator Phillips: I wish to point out that the passage of this bill will have no effect upon the elimination of user fees and extra-billing. The Province of Alberta has already indicated that it will continue with both extra-billing and user fees. It will take the penalty provided in the act. There is no communication from any province involved with extra billing or user fees that they will discontinue the practice as a result of the passage of Bill C-3.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has stated that she will call a conference of the federal and provincial ministers of health after the election. Honourable senators, I am tempted to be a bit partisan and say that I do not think there would be much use in the minister calling the conference after the election. The conference could be held after Easter or in early May. The minister states that she has been negotiating with the provinces for three years.

Senator Frith: Five years.

Senator Phillips: Surely she could be ready to call a conference within one month. This could accomplish a great deal for the future direction of health care and an extended health care service.

I have no quarrel with the idea of a Senate committee studying the problems of health care, but I would point out that the provinces, the main participants in the health scheme, would not have members on that committee, and that, to me, would be the main drawback to such a Senate committee study.

I notice that Senator Frith is sitting there biting his glasses as he often does when he is getting annoyed about being delayed. I would point out to him that this is a real opportunity for those who believe in an elected Senate to vote as they please. They do not have to follow the old Liberal dictum of voting against the provinces every time. Senator Frith could release his followers and let them vote as they please. I would ask him to do that very thing.

Those who believe in the principle of hospitalization and medicare must have some concern about the passage of Bill C-3 with the present adversarial attitude that has developed between the federal and provincial governments. The preamble of the bill states that co-operation is essential for the development of health care; yet, this morning in committee the federal minister refused to meet with the provincial ministers of health. She has disowned the provinces before the bill is even passed. I think that bodes ill for the future of health care in Canada.

Are we accomplishing anything by passing the bill in this present attitude of bitterness, distrust and uncertainty? Are we really assisting health care by proceeding against the wishes of all 10 provinces?

The sponsor speaks of establishing a new direction in health care. Let us find out what that new direction is, honourable senators. Let us find out if mental health and chronic care will be included in that new direction.

We like to boast that we have the finest medical care system in the world, and I believe we have. If it is the finest in the world, honourable senators, it will not be difficult to live with it for another year. Let us agree with the provinces and support the amendment.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I raise two points, the first being on a question of order. I wonder if it would be acceptable to know now, if we can, whether more than one amendment will be proposed and where we could perhaps vote on them all at once. I leave that for someone else to comment on. We are certainly content to vote on amendments separately if necessary.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that the motion in amendment totally ignores the history and the reality of how this legislation came to us. It certainly ignores the evidence that the minister gave before the committee today when Senator Phillips was present. The minister has given very generously of her time to the committee.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It was her duty.

Senator Frith: She did so, obviously, voluntarily.

Senator Phillips: So did the provincial ministers.

Senator Frith: She has appeared before the committee on two occasions, and today, particularly, was asked about why she should not spend more time with the provincial premiers. She pointed out that the problem which arose some five years ago has been addressed by the provinces and the federal government during that time and that it concerned, particularly, the question of extra-billing which, at a certain point, had started at some $11 million. She estimated that the figure is now probably somewhere around $200 million.

To understand the purport of this amendment, it seems to me we should understand the position the minister felt herself to be in as she described it to the committee this morning. Her difficulty is at what point she, as minister, should decide that the erosion in our health care system, brought about by extra billing, is threatening the very principle of the medicare legislation. The house that was built was the house of medicare—the finest system in the world, as Senator Phillips has so accurately and eloquently described it—and the problem was that the foundations upon which that house was built were being eroded every year. What, then, should the Minister of Health have done? She should have met with the provincial Ministers of Health, and she did, for three years. Each year it was getting worse; each year the footings of no extra-billing were crumbling a little more.

● (1510)

At what point should the Minister of Health decide that there has to be an end to it? That is what this bill before us does, honourable senators. In spite of all of the fantasies that Senator Phillips has tried to weave around it, the bill simply takes that principle, which has existed since the beginning of medicare, and has made it very clear. The principle of no extra-billing has long been understood but has never been as clearly defined as it is in this bill. That is basically all this bill does. In effect, it says that we have to stop this erosion, because if we let it go any further—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No! No!

Senator Frith: The minister cannot specify the time at which that might happen, of course; she is not perfect, but she must make the decision. Today, in committee, she was asked this question: "When do you decide?" She said that that is the question: "When do I decide? But at some point I have to decide."

Honourable senators, that is what this bill purports to do.

Senator Flynn: False!

Senator Frith: Of course, it is to the advantage of some that we keep talking about it and keep talking about it and keep talking about it until the foundations are completely eroded and the whole house falls down. We must decide the matter at some point and what the bill proposes to do is to give effect to that decision. The amendment, in effect, proposes that we continue with the talking that has gone on for five years, or for three years under this particular Minister of Health.

Therefore, honourable senators, I think that a decision eventually has to be taken. I ask that this amendment be defeated and that the main motion be accepted.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, Senator Frith told us that the Minister of Health and Welfare generously had appeared before the committee this morning. She answered the questions asked by the committee members. We are willing to admit that she did so generously. However, it was her responsibility and her duty to provide us with the explanations needed to continue our examination of the bill.

I rise to take part in the third reading debate of this bill today mainly to support the amendment moved by Senator Phillips. The Minister suggested this morning in committee that those who were asking questions or requesting information were against the bill. She said so when I asked questions myself and she also repeated the same thing to Senator Flynn when he intervened a bit more vigorously. She suggested the same thing to Senator Tremblay and to Senator Phillips. In other words, the senators who were asking questions or who requested some information were against the bill. Nothing could be further from the truth.

In his great oratorical statement just now, Senator Frith stated that this bill deals only with the basic underlying principles of medicare in Canada, namely, portability, universality, comprehensiveness and accessibility. These are sacred principles. They are just as sacred for us on this side of the House. If this bill had only dealt with extra-billing and user fees, I have the impression that there would not have been any debate in the Senate, because we accept these principles on this side of the House.

I want to make it quite clear that what we tried to point out to the Minister—and I repeat that, this morning, the Minister seemed to be questioning our good faith and our support for the principle of the bill now under consideration—was the red tape that she would create with this federal legislation. We are also concerned about the lack of co-operation that the Minister seems to be showing by refusing the request of the provinces for further meetings and discussions. Senator Frith says that the Minister has been meeting with the provinces for five years. If the provinces had been satisfied with the meetings they have had with the Minister of Health and Welfare, Miss Bégin, they would not be asking to meet her again to have more information about some of the red tape created by this bill.

In reply to the speech delivered by Senator Frith, I want to say that in the preamble to the bill it is stated that any future improvement in our health care system will require the co-operation of governments, health care professionals, voluntary organizations and individual Canadians. This is also what we want. We are trying to show to the governing majority that the preamble sets preliminary conditions that must be met. I told the Minister this morning that she would not have the satisfaction of implementing this bill if she did not have the co-operation of the provincial health ministers. Senator Frith told us that the Minister has been warning the provinces for five years that extra billing and user fees do violate the basic principles of the Act. On the other hand, Mr. Castonguay, a former Liberal health minister in the Bourassa government, one of those responsible for the health insurance system we have in Quebec, said before the committee that the comments made by the Minister were excessive, and he is not a Conservative supporter. He told us that she had used abusive language. We were wondering whether the minister wanted to set up her own election platform. Of course, people want to hear that they will all have free access to medical care and that they will not have to spend a nickel. Did the minister seek to gain a few electoral points by saying: "I will make the provinces toe the line; should any of them maintain user fees, the federal government will again step in and tell them. Either you stop that, or you will be penalized"? That is the kind of language the minister has used since this bill first came up for debate. That is why we said to the Minister of Health this morning that time has come for the federal government to stop invading exclusive provincial jurisdictions.

I do not have enough time to give all references, but I repeat that, with this bill, the federal government is creating administrative irritants which prevent the provinces from setting their own priorities in medical, health and hospital care. Under the act, the federal government will always have the right to intervene and tell the provinces that their priorities are not those of the central government.

The provinces will have to abide by the decisions of the federal Minister of Health lest they be penalized. That, honourable senators, is what we tried to make the Minister of Health understand this morning. I am talking about the province of Quebec because that is where I come from, but the minister, Pierre-Marc Johnson—then responsible for health and welfare in Quebec—was not the only one to complain about administrative harassment and the ambiguous wording of that bill. Mr. Johnson appeared once before the House of Commons committee, and then came back with all his colleagues to plead with senators on our committee, not to block the bill, but to intervene and urge the minister to wait at least a year before implementing the bill. That is exactly the intent of the amendment moved by Senator Phillips so that the provinces will have time to meet with the federal Minister of Health, Miss Bégin, and try to clear up the situation and give Canadians the best possible hospital insurance and medicare system.

This is all the provincial ministers wanted to tell the Senate. For the first time in the history of the Senate all the provinces, represented by their Minister of Health, appeared before a committee of the Senate of Canada to say: "Gentlemen, your role is to represent regional and provincial interests. Our regional and provincial interests are now jeopardized and we ask you to do something."

Senator Frith will tell you that we failed in our responsibilities because we asked the minister for more information. Now, let's be serious! What at least four Conservative senators did this morning is make every effort to try and to protect, as it is the duty of the Senate to do, regional and provincial interests now jeopardized because of the red tape required under the bill. This morning, Senator Flynn and Senator Tremblay pointed out the red tape involved and it was rather funny. Now, honourable senators, I will merely quote clause 13 which reads as follows:

In order that a province may qualify for a full cash contribution referred to in section 5 or payment of the full amount referred to in section 6 for a fiscal year, the government of the province

(b) shall give recognition to the contributions and payments by Canada under this Act in any public documents, or in any advertising or promotional material, relating to insured health services and extended health care services in the province.

If this is not red tape, tell me what is. That kind of red tape can be found throughout that bill.

Therefore it would mean that under clause 13 each time the province makes some expenditures with respect to health care, it would have to publish a very large ad about the federal contribution to such project.

Senator Flynn went even further this morning. He took out his medicare card and compared it with that of our colleague from Ontario, Senator Haidasz. If the Health Minister wants to go further, the Quebec health card will have to mention, under Clause 13, the Canadian government contribution to the Quebec health care and health services.

Senator Asselin: Perhaps, and I would not object to that because I like her very much.

This shows how much our action was warranted. I would like to pay tribute to Senator Bonnell, our Committee Chairman who saw to it that all witnesses throughout Canada could come and meet the members of the Committee and make their representations.

Senator Bonnell is to be commended for the way he chaired that Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. Therefore, honourable senators, it is not asking too much that we reflect the provinces' views and, as proposed in Senator Phillip's amendment, that we wait another year for the meeting of provincial and Canadian Health Ministers. Let us try and give Canadians the best possible medicare and hospital care system.

If honourable senators on the Government side are once more bound by party line, the conclusion will be that this Government relishes confrontation with the provinces. That once more, this Government will not negotiate with the provinces. This Government, with its spending power, is helping build a federalism of such a centralizing nature that provinces will become mere regional agencies.

This is not the way the health care system should operate across Canada in our view. I urge the honourable senators opposite, those on the Government side, to support Senator Phillips' amendment so that we may give Canadians the best possible health program.

[English]

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak in this debate. However, I rise to say that the amendment proposed by Senator Phillips has my full support, and I urge others to join me in that support. In due course I shall express that support by my vote, but at this time I wish to say that things have been said here today that, in my view, should be refuted. If one believed what Senator Frith had to say, one would accept that the poor minister had been assiduously conferring with provincial Ministers of Health, endeavouring to reach a conclusion on this difficult matter, for a period of five years.

Senator Frith: No; I said three.

Senator Donahoe: The honourable senator said the conferring had been going on for five years. There is no use his shaking his head. That is what he said.

Senator Frith: No. I said three years with this minister; five years in total.

Senator Donahoe: The honourable senator said that the conferences had been continuing for five years.

Senator Frith: The problem had been continuing for five years.

Senator Donahoe: I simply want to say that to some extent I agree with that. There have been conferences going on for five years, between the federal Minister of Health and Welfare and the provincial Ministers of Health. However, they have been individual, separate conferences. On one day it was a conference between the federal minister and the minister of one province, and, the next day, between the federal minister and the minister of another province. To my knowledge, there has not been any conference comprising the federal Minister of Health and Welfare and all of the provincial Ministers of Health.

I had occasion to attend the excellent committee meeting convened by the Chairman of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee, to which were invited all of the provincial Ministers of Health. They were all there, not only the provincial ministers, but also the Ministers of Health representing the territories. Each one was heard in succession—not just a few, but each one—and each minister was unanimous in saying “We do not want this bill. This bill will cause more difficulties than it will solve”. As Senator Phillips has pointed out, this bill does nothing to improve health services—

Senator Frith: It will stop extra-billing. It is that simple. Of course it will cause problems, because it will stop extra billing. That is what it is supposed to do.

Senator Donahoe: I will come to that. The point that I wish to make, and that Senator Phillips made, is that those ministers came here not in a contentious or argumentative mood, not endeavouring to challenge the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare, but in a reasonable, sensible effort to reach a conclusion that would be a compromise and acceptable to all. They met with a stone wall and were told that they could not do it. Today we have a resolution which is similar to the one introduced by Senator Flynn last week, saying that we should defer the coming into effect of this bill to provide an opportunity for the federal Minister of Health and Welfare to meet with the Ministers of Health of the provinces and discuss the matter in the hope of achieving a peaceful and amicable solution. Again we are faced with a stone wall. This amendment provides an opportunity for the Senate to stand up and say that it believes in moderation, common sense, seeking compromise and that we are not in favour of a policy of confrontation. It would say that we believe that reasonable men and women, given the opportunity to sit and discuss problems, will come to a reasonable solution.

● (1530)

Honourable senators may vote as they please on the amendment but they must bear in mind that if they vote against it they are voting against the possibility of a conference at which all could be present to talk further about the suggestion. The minister may have conferred with all the provinces but she did so one at a time. How does one know what she said to any province?

Senator Frith: That is not right. What happened in Halifax?

[Senator Donahoe.]

Senator Donahoe: How do you know what was said?

Senator Frith: She met with all of them in Halifax.

Senator Donahoe: The federal ministry—I am not talking about the minister—was conferring on this question individually with the provinces and each time it made its case only to the person with whom the discussion was held.

Senator Frith: That is not true.

Senator Donahoe: Nobody knows what was said or what arguments were advanced. Certainly, the other nine provinces do not know what was said.

Senator Frith: She told us in committee that she met with them in Halifax and told them what took place. Read the committee record.

Senator Donahoe: She met with whom?

Senator Frith: The provincial ministers.

Senator Donahoe: I once attended a federal-provincial conference after which it was said there had been a conference between the provinces and the federal government. My response was a very simple one. When I speak of conferring I speak of meaningful conference, and there was no meaningful conference of any kind held with the Minister of Health.

Senator Frith: “Meaningful” means agreeing with you.

Senator Donahoe: It is a meaningful conference that is proposed today. I suggest that we will be doing less than our duty if we do not vote in favour of the amendment. If the minister has such a strong case and if her arguments are so sound, why is she fearful of putting them forward in full in an atmosphere where all will know what they are and will be able to judge them?

Senator Frith: She has done it.

Senator Donahoe: I was the Minister of Health for the Province of Nova Scotia for some 15 years. It was during the course of my time as minister that medicare and hospital insurance came into effect in Nova Scotia. The gentleman opposite reminds me of a man who was opposed to me politically and who endeavoured to injure me in every way with his publication. In my opinion he was a yellow journalist. He was overheard one day saying to somebody who had said in my defence, “After all, he brought hospital insurance and medicare to this province”, “Maybe he did but he did not believe in them.” I want honourable senators to know that I went the length and breadth of the province of Nova Scotia advocating the principles of medicare and hospital insurance and proving that we believed in them and brought them in.

At the time we brought these measures in we had to get the assistance and co-operation of the medical profession, which was not the easiest thing to do. One of the things we had to do to secure their support was include a provision in the bill that extra-billing—and in deference to the doctors, I must say that they do not like the term “extra-billing” but always called it “billing to schedule”—be allowed. I was not in favour of billing to schedule. I felt they were being generously treated and thought that they should be satisfied with what they got. Nonetheless, in order to get their consent, agreement and co-operation, we included a clause permitting extra billing. I could say to you that you might say that we were yielding to the doctors and if we had been men of our word and of substance we would have stood up to the medical profession and not gone along with the proposal.

During the remaining years for which I was the Minister of Health, and there were many of them, we were funded in part by the federal government. We did not have premiums but paid according to a general tax. However, all the provisions in our act were accepted by the federal government. No question was ever raised on the matter. Never did they say that we were abusing the privileges given to overbill, nor did they ever use the word which my honourable friend used here this afternoon, "eroding". The honourable senator says that the whole structure of medicare and the whole health care system is being eroded by this provision for extra-billing and user fees. He did not make a very good case for it. I thought Senator Phillips answered that case before it was even made, but it is being made here again this afternoon. The honourable senator also talked about fantasies. He certainly ought to know about fantasies because if I ever heard anybody who could set up a bogey-man better than the senator is able to, he is not in this chamber.

Senator Phillips: He is a good disciple.

Senator Donahoe: There has never been any complaint by the ministry in Ottawa over the use made of those provisions in the act. We in Nova Scotia think we developed a very successful act and that we have provided good medical care. We realize that it is becoming increasingly difficult to do so because as the years have gone by the proportion of federal government support for the plan in general, as the senator clearly pointed out, has dropped. When I accepted the terms of the federal government for medicare on behalf of the Province of Nova Scotia I did so on the understanding that they would pay us 50 per cent of the cost of medicare. That is what they agreed to. If they are paying 50 per cent of the cost of medicare today I am a Dutchman.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: You are a Dutchman.

Senator Frith: Senator "Van Donahoe."

Senator Donahoe: I can tell you I am not much of a Dutchman. I can tell honorable senators that the plan has worked well with no abuse or erosion and with no fear of erosion, other than a fancied one, in Nova Scotia. That fancied fear has been set up here this afternoon as the reason why we should act.

Senator Frith: $200 million worth of fancy.

Senator Donahoe: It is fancied, whether or not Senator Frith likes me to say so. It is a fanciful and imaginary fear and honourable senators are being asked to vote in favour of that fear. I say that it is an unjustified fear and one that does not exist. It is one that need not exist if the federal government had lived up to the obligations it undertook in the beginning.

I made a speech to this effect once before in this chamber. I said that the federal government does not provide the same proportion of the cost of health services that it agreed to provide in the beginning. Senator Austin rose to his feet and made a speech. In the speech he said that the Conservatives were opposed to medicare. Somebody said, "What makes you say that?" He said, "Well, they stood on their feet and said it." And somebody said, "Who said it?" He said, "Senator Donahoe said it." On a subsequent day I called him to account and asked him to justify how he could attribute such a comment to me. He was unable to do so and was so ungracious that he did not offer an apology. I want to say that we on this side of the house are not against medicare. We believe in medicare and we sympathize with its principles. We realize the difficulties in carrying out the health care program. We realize that these difficulties have been multiplied by the niggardly attitude of the federal government in its percentage of support.

● (1540)

We feel that we could arrive at a proper conclusion and do service to the people of Canada in the rendering of health care if the provincial ministers of health and the Minister of National Health and Welfare for Canada sat down and gave reasonable consideration to how that can best be accomplished. It certainly is not being accomplished in the best possible way by this bill. The quicker we talk about this bill and the quicker we see whether or not there is some opportunity to make it a sensible and meaningful one which can carry out the objects which it purports to carry out, then the better for all of the people of Canada.

Accordingly, I urge honourable senators to vote in support of the amendment as proposed by Senator Phillips.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I did not intend to speak on third reading of this bill. However, after listening to Senator Donahoe's eloquent remarks I thought I should stand up and follow him, which is a difficult thing to do.

I would like to say that Senator Donahoe is correct when he says that he was the man who put medicare and hospital insurance into effect in the province of Nova Scotia. At the same time he was doing that I was carrying out a similar job in Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bonnell: Both Senator Donahoe and myself believed in what we were doing or we would not have done it. Honourable senators know that both of us are very determined men—we do not do anything we do not want to do. We certainly believed in the legislation at the time or we would not have supported it. However, at that time Senator Donahoe and myself had negotiated a good deal. We negotiated a deal in which we would receive 50 per cent of the national average and 50 per cent of the cost in our provinces. Since the costs in our provinces were less than the national average Nova Scotia received not 50 per cent but, perhaps, 55 per cent or 57 per cent while Prince Edward Island received approximately 70 per cent of the actual costs of medicare.

The ministers of health who followed us were not as astute politicians as we were. In 1977 they said that they did not want average billing; instead, they wanted block funding. That was the day the provinces put their foot in it—something for which Senator Donahoe and myself cannot be blamed. These ministers of health—and I do not know what political faith they were, that is immaterial—did not look far enough into the future as Senator Donahoe did.

Senator Donahoe says that the Minister of National Health and Welfare should put her ideals forward and let the people know what they are. I think she did that. She did that by putting on paper what we call Bill C-3. Every representative of the people in the other place, regardless of political faith, agreed with her. That is why we have the bill in this place today.

Hon. Jack Marshall: You cannot keep the audience's attention—they are all leaving!

Senator Bonnell: I can see that I cannot hold the audience's attention as well as Senator Donahoe did.

I sympathize with the Minister of National Health and Welfare in trying to put forth this bill in the realization that she does not have the consent of all provinces.

Senator Flynn: That is an understatement!

Senator Bonnell: I sympathize with all the ministers of health because they have their own concerns and they must go back to their people. I sympathize with the medical profession because as a result of this bill they will lose balance billing while hoping to obtain arbitration. However, that arbitration will not be compulsory.

I sympathize with the nursing profession because they are trying to have the word "practitioner" incorporated into the bill. I sympathize with the consumers because they do not want to have user fees or balance billing.

I sympathize with everybody. However, someone had to take the bull by the horns and the minister did that. Surprisingly enough, every member in the House of Commons supported her. She seems to have broad support from the representatives of the people.

Senator Flynn: At the federal level.

Senator Bonnell: At the federal level, yes, you are quite right, I should have said that.

I sympathize with Senator Phillips because I know he supports the bill. I understand that he supports the medical profession, the nurses, the dentists and, generally, health care.

Senator Asselin: He would like you to support his amendment, too.

Senator Bonnell: I would like to support his amendment.

Senator Asselin: I am sure you will.

Senator Bonnell: I would like to support everybody.

Senator Flynn: Then you must be a supporter of John Turner!

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Bonnell: I would like to ask one simple question of Senator Phillips in order to clarify in my own mind which way to vote on the amendment.

Senator Asselin: Abstain!

Senator Bonnell: I might have to do that if I do not receive an explanation.

Senator Asselin: You are the chairman of the committee, you could abstain.

Senator Bonnell: As chairman of the committee I am trying to balance the issues. I do not want to give my support one way or the other without having some good reason.

Senator Asselin: It would be a good thing for us if you were to abstain.

Senator Bonnell: I am sympathetic to Senator Phillips' motion. However, I did not quite understand one phase of his explanation. He said that he was surprised to find that some of the members of our committee were more concerned with $6 than they were with $6 billion. That left me with the impression that because of this concern of our members he wanted to give us another year in which to think about the matter. Before I vote I would like to ask him one question: Do you want a $6 extra fee? I did not receive the impression in committee that you did. I received the impression from the Leader of the Opposition in committee that you fellows on that side of the house were against extra billing, that you were against the $6.

Senator Asselin: I said that.

Senator Bonnell: You said it too. However, Senator Phillips seemed to think that we as committee members were taking the wrong attitude, that we should not be worried about the $6 but, rather, only about the $6 billion. Thus, I would like Senator Phillips to explain to me where he stands. Is he for the $6 extra fee or is he against it?

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I will be happy to explain to Senator Bonnell, after which I am sure I will have his support.

I do not recall saying that it was committee members—perhaps I did. I said that Senator Thériault expressed concern with respect to the $6 fee but did not express concern with respect to the $6 billion. I would far rather see the $6 fee eliminated and the $6 billion replaced. I hope that answers the honourable senator's question.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, my intention was to base my arguments on some of the remarks made by Senator Frith. I just might give Senator Bonnell some second thoughts which will help him—at least, I hope so—to decide how he is going to vote on the amendment.

Senator Frith talked about five years of negotiations.

Senator Frith: No, of problems.

Senator Tremblay: If that is so, Senator Frith, I think you should say 15 to 20 years—in fact, back to the implementation of those programs—and this allusion to five years of problems does not have any meaning in the context of our debate.

As I said the other day—but I think Senator Frith was then talking to somebody else—we have to start with the evidence given by Miss Bégin herself before the committee. She told us in no uncertain terms that she and her health colleagues had reached a consensus in May 1982, and the best definition of that consensus is the following statement she made herself:

I finally convinced everybody in May 1982 that we ought to control extra-billing and user charges, which meant that extra-billing and user charges would be acceptable to a limited extent.

That seems to me to be the turning point in this case: in 1982, all health ministers, including the federal minister, had agreed that the growth of extra-billing and user charges ought to be slowed down. After May 1982, Miss Bégin changed her position. The consensus vanished. She introduced a bill to ban extra-billing and user charges.

I, for one, can live with the principle that a bill can do away with user charges and extra-billing, with equivalent monetary penalties. This brings me to the second remark made by Senator Frith—indeed, others have said the same thing, including Senator Hébert—who described the situation as if the issue were nothing more than user charges or extra-billing. However, honourable senators, you know very well that such is not the case in Bill C-3. Where is the reference to extra-billing and user charges? If we consider subtitles as parts of the bill, these are mentioned in part 8. Once again, I repeat that I agree with this. By and large, I agree with the nature of the penalty where there is no high-handedness. An amount corresponding to user fees and extra-billing will be withdrawn from the federal contribution. There could be some technical difficulty about the specific amount, but this is an objective, practical and measurable penalty and I foresee no problem in this regard.

However, especially as concerns penalties for other violations, the bill includes many other things which precede user fees and extra-billing. This shows that the purpose of this bill is much more general and that user fees and extra-billing are only a specific instance of a failure to comply.

Let us consider everything else, namely the other failures to comply. In my opinion, this is where we find the most fundamental flaw of this bill, which concerns the discretionary and high-handed powers given to the Cabinet. This is a perfect case of what I would call executive federalism and, in this case, the arbitrary powers of the Cabinet, in the most important parts of the legislation. Naturally, there is no problem in defining certain things generally in principle. Indeed, we are told that, in this regard, with a few amendments, of which some are, in fact, causing problems, this bill simply combines what was already contained in two previous laws. Definitions have been included. The general principles of medicare in Canada have been listed, namely, public management, integration, and so on. These principles are clearly defined. Finally, on all the points which correspond to sections 8 to 12, and finally section 13, violations are possible because, and this is where the bill appears to be high-handed, the legislation states that, in the case of a failure to comply, the following will happen:

14. (1) Subject to subsection (3), where the Minister, after consultation in accordance with subsection (2) with the minister responsible for health care in a province, is of the opinion that

(a) the health care insurance plan of the province does not or has ceased to satisfy any one of the criteria described in sections 8 to 12, or

(b) the province has failed to comply with any condition set out in section 13, and the province has not given an undertaking satisfactory to the Minister to remedy the default within a period that the Minister considers reasonable, the Minister shall refer the matter to the Governor in Council.

What will the Governor in Council do or what can he do? This is specified in section 15:

15. (1) Where, on the referral of a matter under section 14—

This is the section of which I read the first part; the second provides for an exchange of views between the federal Minister and the provinces, always on a consultative basis, naturally. As I was saying:

15. (1) Where, on the referral of a matter under section 14, the Governor in Council is of the opinion that the health care insurance plan of a province does not or has ceased to satisfy any one of the criteria described in sections 8 to 12 or that a province has failed to comply with any condition set out in section 13, the Governor in Council may, by order,

(a) direct that any cash contribution or amount payable to that province for a fiscal year be reduced, in respect of each default, by an amount that the Governor in Council considers to be appropriate, having regard to the gravity of the default;

This sounds like a confessor or a teacher. And then:

(b) where the Governor in Council considers it appropriate, direct that the whole of any cash contribution or amount payable to that province for a fiscal year be withheld.

● (1600)

I emphasize the words “where . . . (he) considers it appropriate”. This is where the high-handedness comes in. In addition, instead of being well identified and limited to an identifiable offence, such as extra-billing or user fees, for which the penalty is perfectly matched with the offence, the penalty is undefined and the relationship between it and the failure to comply, to use the same wording as the bill, is left completely at the discretion of the Cabinet based on the report presented by the Minister.

Obviously, therefore, this bill does much more than to remedy the problem about which we have seen so many examples of demagoguery on behalf of the poor patient who would be faced with a medical bill for $6, and I quite agree that he should have nothing to pay, but it still remains that these examples of demagoguery seem out of proportion sometimes with the nature of the problems. But let us put this aside.

So, that bill deals with many other things besides user charges and extra-billing. There are those discretionary provisions I have just described, for example. I feel that, the provinces can rightfully ask questions and demand explanations about those provisions because I am convinced that consultations were not as thorough on those aspects as some have suggested if they ever specifically dealt with user charges and extra-billing. Under those circumstances and considering even more basic facts, it seems to me that it would be proper and wise to take enough time to explain those other things, since those consultations would be more consistent with a system defined as a partnership between the federal government and the provinces. To impose such a bill would be unacceptable especially as far as those other issues are concerned and I insist on that because nobody challenges the provisions on user charges and extra-billing. I would even say that following such a meeting, if some provinces wanted to stick with user charges or extra-billing I would be willing to go along with the minister.

As for the rest, let us at least try to lessen the discretionary powers I mentioned earlier about penalties; let us at least give this matter some sober second thought. That brings to mind the way this House was ignored when it would have been so easy to include us in the process. Under clause 15(3):

the Minister shall cause the order and statement to be laid before each House of Parliament on any of the first fifteen days on which that House is sitting after the order is made.

Moreover, clause 15(4) adds the following:

(4) An order made under subsection (1) shall not come into force earlier than thirty days after a copy of the order has been sent to the government of the province concerned under subsection (3).

I raised the issue in committee this morning. Why not give both Houses or only this House, since the other House having voted on third reading has rejected my suggestion, enough time to act as a chamber of sober second thought in a matter such as the above-mentioned violations to determine to what extent the penalties for such violations are subject to an arbitrary decision of the cabinet. This is the most blatant case of what is called delegated legislation, which opens the door to all kinds of arbitrary decisions. I believe the Senate, as a chamber of sober second thought, should have the assurance that it will have time to review what is supposed to be tabled within 15 sitting days after the order is made. There is no such guarantee because, assuming the order is made at a time the Senate is not sitting, the 30-day period after a copy of the order has been sent to the province will expire before we resume sitting, so we will be informed after the fact. This guarantee seems essential to me in order for us to fulfill our responsibilities as a chamber of sober second thought and as moderators of delegated legislation and the discretionary powers of the executive branch—the protectors, in fact, of all parties against discretionary powers resulting from the way the bill has been drafted.

In fact, I must add that one of the recommendations in the report of the Special Committee on Senate Reform is precisely that the Senate should play an active role in matters of delegated legislation.

We have a good example here. In order to give such a guarantee, it is only necessary to add that an order made under subsection (1) shall not come into force earlier than 30 days after the order has been laid before the Senate. I do not believe such a guarantee could affect the implementation of the Act.

In fact, in answer to a question I asked this morning in committee regarding the three-month period from April 1, 1984, to June 30, 1984, during which there will be no penalties for extra-billing or user fees, Miss Bégin said that this three-month period was essential from an administrative point of view for the implementation of the system. I agree that three months is a reasonable period of time to get the whole thing under way. Once more, this shows that the bill deals with much more than extra-billing or user fees. Anyway, my suggestion does not create an additional problem. It has nothing to do with the administrative procedures involved here.

We must keep in mind that there is more to it than extra-billing and user fees, that the real problems stem precisely from these other matters, that careful thought will be required, and that, in the circumstances, the provinces have said they wish to discuss the matter in depth with the Health Minister. This is why I think the proposal to postpone consideration of the bill to allow time for a meeting, which was rejected the other day, made sense, and why the amendment proposed by Senator Phillips is sound. For these reasons, instead of going ahead in a climate of systematic confrontation between the federal government and the provinces, since the program is based by definition on partnership and co-operation, it seems to me we should agree to such an amendment which would make it possible to work things out rather than fight them out.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Muir:

That this bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended by:

(1) replacing subclause 4 of clause 20 with: "No amount may be deducted under subsection (1) or (2) in respect of extra-billing or user charges in the period between April 1, 1985 and June 30, 1985."; and

(2) replacing clause 34 with: "This Act shall come into force on April 1, 1985."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Please call in the senators.

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, before this process of birth of a new Canada Health Act takes place, I guess we can compare ourselves, in this chamber, to obstetricians attending the birth of a new Canada Health Act.

I would not want this opportunity to pass without paying a tribute to the Minister of National Health and Welfare for her courageous initiative in trying to save the medicare system of Canada, which we all believe is one of the best in the world and which all of us want to improve.

I have followed the proceedings of the committee and I want to say how much I admire the members of the opposition for their constructive criticism. I want to thank them for that because we have learned a lot from what they had to contribute. Also, our thanks should go to the chairman of our committee for the very fine way in which he has guided us through our study of the bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order, was Senator Haidasz resuming the debate on third reading?

Senator Haidasz: Before.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Before.

Senator Asselin: Did you call third reading?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is my understanding that Senator Haidasz is speaking on the matter at third reading.

Senator Frith: He made that speech without extra-billing.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: In reply to Senator Haidasz, I must say that this birth may be a happy event for him, but the fact is that the majority had to resort to a Caesarian section.

[English]

Senator Frith: Yes, but you could have made it easier.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: This is the position the provinces will take. The Canadian government fathered a child which the provinces, being the mother, will have to care for. This bodes evil for the new system.

There may not be much point in extending the debate. I would like to stress two things. Senator Hébert, who sponsored the bill, and Senator Thériault who supported it on the government side, and also Senator Frith, not to mention Senator Haidasz who could not really comment, and I except Senator Bonnell, all insisted on restricting the issue to extra-billing. Those who spoke before me on this side, Senator Phillips and Senator Donahoe, Senator Asselin and Senator Tremblay all emphasized that the bill goes much further in fact. The main issue is not extra-billing.

This morning in committee I questioned the Minister, without getting any answer on that—and anyway each time, we put a question in committee she sidetracked the question. She always came back with political points, because if you seem to support extra-billing however lightly, this could have been included in an election platform. If there had been the least intention to solve that problem of extra-billing, the existing act could simply have been amended by adding the provisions in clauses 18 to 21 included. The question of extra-billing would have been solved. But the remaining parts substitute for the existing system a system open to arbitrary decisions. This is where we can expect difficulties.

It is a sad reflection that our efforts on this side of the House met with no understanding from the government side. We wanted to make it clear that between the two levels of government, there was no room for pressuring or high-handedness.

Although Senator Hébert said that since there was a majority to pass the legislation in the other place, our Canadian regions were well represented, I believe that the Senate has a regional role to play. This is not the thrust of our parliamentary system.

If in fact the Senate stays idle when the House of Commons has no answer, this second Chamber has no purpose. The intent was to solve the problem of popular representation, and what is why the Senate is not an elective body, even to this day, and why it is supposed to balance the people's reaction, what might be called the instinctive and electoral reaction of the House of Commons. The Senate was told to deal with those matters, to provide checks and balances to the popular feeling. It is much to be regretted, as I said, that the Senate did not discharge that responsibility placed upon it by the Founding Fathers. Once more we will have missed the goal.

Of course, it remains to be seen how the Senate will be reformed. One thing is certain, we will have missed an opportunity to prove that under exceptional circumstances, we can try to adjudicate between the central government and the provinces. We could then have had a chance of finding solutions, of removing the arbitrary character from the legislation. We missed this opportunity. Let us now hope for the best.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps I will clarify what I believe to be the position of the government and that of some of my colleagues on the particular issue raised by Senator Flynn. We agree with the motivation behind what he expressed; that is, that the Senate does have a clear role with regard to representations made by the provinces and with regard to regional interests. It seems to me, however, that there is a fallacy in the assumption that, if the Senate invites all of the provincial representatives interested in the particular piece of legislation to be heard—as it did in this case, for which the committee should be congratulated—and if the Senate fails to agree with them, then it has somehow abdicated its responsibilities. The logical corollary to that is that the only time the Senate fulfills its obligations is when it listens to the representations of the provinces and to those of the federal government, after which it must reject the position of the federal government and accept that of the provinces or else it has abdicated its responsibilities.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn: Give us one occasion when that happened.

Senator Frith: What happened in this case is precisely what the Senate, in circumstances such as these, should have done. That is, the Senate invited and listened to all points of view, including those of the provincial representatives. In the considered opinion of many of my colleagues and certainly in my opinion, having heard those representations, this bill is necessary. We support the position taken by the federal government. The principles of this bill have been discussed on many occasions—contrary to what Senator Donahoe has said—when the minister has met with all of the provincial ministers. She has done so at least four times in the last year. After listening to all of the views on the matter, it is our belief that we ought to support the position of the federal government.

Therefore, I simply want it stated clearly on the record that, by voting in favour of this legislation, I and many of my colleagues believe in its principle, think it should be passed now and do not vote against or in any way contrary to the views of the provincial governments.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a very brief—

Senator Frith: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; Senator Phillips has spoken on the motion for third reading and I do not think that he can speak again.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I seem to recall that Senator Frith has also participated.

Hon. Jack Marshall: He can do anything he wants.

Senator Frith: I spoke to the amendment.

Senator Phillips: You see, it is different over there.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable Senator Phillips, I regret that the point has been made that you have spoken on this motion. Unless there is unanimous consent—

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I should like to direct a question to Senator Frith. Has the Senate ever played its role as the guardian of the rights of regions, minorities and especially provinces? Give me just one instance when it did.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

17 April 1984

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 17th day of April, 1984, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 8, 1984, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, I will explain if leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, to reaffirm what I said earlier, the rules in the other place provide for adjournment this Thursday, April 19 until April 29. Therefore they will return on April 30.

I have inquired about legislation or other business that might require our returning on the same date. I have also discussed the matter with Senator Flynn, and it appears that on that basis there is no need for us to return the same week as the Commons. Therefore I have moved the adjournment of the Senate until Tuesday, May 8. I am proposing that we sit at 2 p.m. on that day because I believe that there will be a joint address to the House of Commons and the Senate at 11 a.m. that day. Honourable senators will be making arrangements to be here during the day anyway, and the Senate will therefore sit at 2 p.m. In accordance with our present agreement, we shall no doubt sit at 8 p.m. on the following Tuesday.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, at least one committee that I know of has tentatively been scheduled to meet at 1.30 p.m. on that day, on the assumption that the Senate would be sitting at 8 p.m. that evening. This may not be a matter of great moment, but it seems a pity to change the time. No doubt Senator Doody should speak to this matter, but he is not present in the chamber.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we are always sensitive to plans that are made on the basis of our proposed schedules, and we expect some flexibility and sensitivity from our committee chairmen, just as they expect the same degree of flexibility and sensitivity from us. These things happen, but I am sure that the honourable senator will agree that they do not happen that often. It is regrettable, but we have to be flexible for such things as joint addresses and other unexpected parliamentary events.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN VETERANS

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, May 8, 1984, I will move:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues still facing Canadian veterans;

That the Committee be composed of 5 Senators to be designated at a later date;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than November 1, 1984.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION ACT, 1979

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-12, intituled: "An Act to amend the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979".—(Honourable Senator Asselin P.C.).

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I crave your indulgence because it would appear that we should proceed with second reading of this bill in view of the fact that there is some urgency to have the bill referred to the appropriate Senate committee.

This is not a controversial bill, although it is a rather technical one. I made a search and learned that no legislative action was taken on this matter until 1971, when Parliament enacted the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, which came into force on April 1, 1971. The act expired on March 31, 1979 and was replaced by the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979. The act would have ceased to be in force on March 31, 1984, but has been extended for one year to March 31, 1985.

The purpose of the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979, is to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act in order to allow them to continue to exist on a legal basis. The act allows conferences to operate freely in Canadian trade subject to certain requirements designed to protect the public interest.

Conferences are required to supply the shippers' group with information sufficient for the satisfactory conduct of meetings between the two groups. The 1979 act requires conferences to make available to the public for inspection all documents and tariffs filed with the Canadian Transport Commission.

An interdepartmental committee under the Ministry of Transport was formed to review the 1979 act. Other departments included Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Finance, External Affairs, Economic Development and the Treasury Board.

The CTC held public hearings during June 1982 to examine the operations and administration of the provisions of the act, and their report was distributed in February, 1983. In addition, there were five studies commissioned to review various aspects of the act.

The general conclusion was that Canadian trade was being reasonably served by the conferences, but major points emerging from the reviews were the availability of information, meaningful consultation, and an effective method of dispute settlement. Other proposals addressed areas in the current act requiring clarification and areas requiring changes to ensure that competition is not unduly restricted, and that the public interest is protected.

With regard to the amendments to the act, the major provisions of the new policy are to require meaningful consultation between conferences and shipper representatives; conferences to give 90 days' notice of freight rate increases, and 14 days' notice of surcharge increases; and conferences and the designated shippers' group to submit annual reports.

Amendments to the act establish the right of either party to submit unresolved matters to conciliation; that failing to negotiate in good faith is against the public interest; and, the right of independent action for members of a conference where there is no regularly scheduled service provided by a non-conference carrier.

● (1650)

The amendments removed the present exemption from the Combines Investigation Act which provided for contracts, agreements or arrangements between conferences and independents. The amendments clarified that the Director of Investigation is a person, that contracts, agreements or arrangements between members of a conference must be filed before being exempt from the Combines Investigation Act; that patronage contracts may be for less than 100 per cent of the shippers' goods and that the act does not grant exemption from the Combines Investigation Act for predatory behaviour. Finally, the amendments authorize an increase in fines for penalties under the act and the CTC to lift the exemption provided to conferences if necessary to protect the public interest.

[Senator Asselin.]

[Translation]

It would seem to me that the purpose of the new amendments is to give the Canadian Transport Commission a leading role as umpire or, better still, as supervisor with respect to agreements, rates and penalties if the provisions are not respected.

The conferences can still operate freely in Canada, provided they meet additional requirements designed to better safeguard the public interest.

The shipping conferences will therefore have to follow stricter guidelines which will enable them to follow certain standards and benefit from exemptions under the Combines Investigation Act.

I still cannot understand the full meaning of the second objective described by Senator Frith, which is to promote the settlement of conflicts between the parties involved, without the intervention of the Canadian Transport Commission. In case of conflict, as we know, the CTC attends the consultation proceedings only as an observer, but in no way does it intervene as umpire; the parties involved are left to find a way out of the conflict.

I would be inclined to give the CTC a wider mandate to intervene since we are talking about conflicts between shippers and, therefore, the public interest is at stake.

Having said that, honourable senators, I think it would be interesting to know more about studies which were made during a sitting of the committee and to which I referred earlier, because that would give us a clearer idea of the impact of this legislation on shipping conferences.

I have no objection to the bill being referred to the appropriate Senate committee.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must point out that if Senator Frith takes the floor now, his speech will close the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think I have nothing to add concerning the substance of this bill.

As to the reference to a committee, it seems to me that, although some aspects of this bill could be considered by various committees, when we changed the terms of reference of the committees, we made a distinction between the two jurisdictions of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs so as to single out the field of competition in banking, trade and commerce.

For that reason, honourable senators, I would suggest that that is the committee to which the bill should be referred.

If the bill is given second reading, I intend to move that the bill be referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE
AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-13

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-13, intituled: "An Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there is the possibility of confusion between this bill and the bill to establish the Security Intelligence Service. They are not the same. This bill deals with some changes, apparently supported by the force, to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act. The minister and the government have asked the Senate to consider studying the matter in advance and that is why the motion is being proposed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): At what stage is this bill in the other place?

Senator Frith: I believe it is at first reading.

Senator Flynn: So it has not been debated or referred to committee?

Senator Frith: That is my understanding. The point Senator Flynn is thinking of is that we do not like to study a bill in advance here while it is before a committee of the other place.

Senator Flynn: If the government does not see the possibility of proceeding with the bill until some time in the near future, I think we can accept the motion of the deputy leader. I suppose we have to assume that that is the situation.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we will have to consider how far the committee goes ahead on the matter. The bill received first reading on January 30 and it is my understanding from the minister that it is not his intention to proceed with the bill in the other place until he has received the report of our committee or, at least, until he knows that we have studied the matter.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) for Senator Hastings, moved:

That for the balance of the present Session, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesdays, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: When the committee chairmen recommended that we resume sittings on Wednesday they also agreed to leave the latter part of the afternoon for committees. Honourable senators will remember that previously the whole afternoon was open for committees. That is why Senator Hastings is asking for this permission to sit at four o'clock.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services provided under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof (Bill C-3 Chapter No. 6)

An Act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Gerald Harvey Fudge and Audrey Marie Saunders (Bill S-2)

An Act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Louis Philippe Nadeau and Marie Thérèse Rita Brulé (Bill S-3)

An Act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Ernest Hodel and Norma Dora Laurie (Bill S-4)

An Act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Benjamin Joseph Andrade and Heather Winnifred Andrade (Bill S-5)

An act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Juan Andrade and Emilia Rodriguez (Bill S-6)

An Act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Henri Patry and Aldéa Béa Pitt (Bill S-7)

An Act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Joseph Roland Réjean Daoust and Marie Lise Sylvie Girard (Bill S-8)

An Act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Pearl Kim Lee and Thomas Siegfried Wieland (Bill S-9)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate resumed.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

AWARD WINNING LAW STUDENTS AND PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN BAR ASSOCIATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I move the motion to adjourn, the Chairman of the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has asked for leave to recognize some special guests in the gallery.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I would like to draw to your attention the presence in the south gallery of some very distinguished visitors, four law students who were awarded prizes by His Excellency the Governor General this morning at the second annual Law Day Essay Competition, in which all law schools in Canada took part. This competition is sponsored by the Law Reform Commission of Canada and the Canadian Bar Association.

The winners are: '

Lilja Elianne Lawler, Osgoode Hall, York University, first prize in English.

Pierre Rainville, Université Laval, first prize in French.

Leonard Abramowicz, McGill University, second prize in English.

Louise Maguire Wellington, Université d'Ottawa, Section Droit civil, second prize in French.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Neiman: Accompanying the winners at the award ceremony this morning, and also in the gallery, are some distinguished members of the Canadian Bar. In particular, it gives me pleasure to welcome Mr. Robert McKercher, the President of the Canadian Bar Association, and Mrs. McKercher.

EASTER GREETINGS

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I would like to wish you a rewarding Easter holiday.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On behalf of our side, I wish all the senators opposite a Happy Easter and the resurrection I had hoped for on Bill C-3. Perhaps it will occur on some other occasion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If you allow me, before we leave this Chamber, I would like to wish everyone a very Happy Easter and a well earned holiday. I invite you to the usual reception, and I also invite the pages and the Senate staff since during the break we shall be losing Anne-Marie Fortin, a page who has been with us for quite a while. I therefore suggest that the pages and the staff of the Senate keep us company on this occasion.

[English]

I would also like to extend an invitation to the four winners of the Law Day 1984 Essay Competition, together with the distinguished members of the Canadian Bar, to join with us on this occasion.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 8, 1984 at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—COMMONS MEMBERS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons:

HOUSE OF COMMONS CANADA

Friday, May 4, 1984

ORDERED—That the Members to serve on the part of this House on the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs be Mr. Berger, Mr. Bockstael, Mr. Bosley, Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra), Mme Côté, Mr. Gauthier, Mr. Gimaiel, Mr. Gourd, Mr. Hawkes, Mr. Kilgour, Mr. Marceau, Ms McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood), Mr. Nystrom, Mr. Reid (Kenora—Rainy River) and Mr. St. Germain;

That all reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages and the evidence adduced by the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages in the present Parliament be deemed to have been referred to the said committee; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT

BILL C-205, AN ACT TO CHANGE THE NAME OF THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF HULL—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-205, an Act to change the name of the electoral district of Hull.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a second time, honourable senators?

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move:

That the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later today.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if the bill's sponsor has any reasons for asking us to proceed immediately, I would appreciate hearing them now.

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, there is no special reason, except that the bill was presented the first time on November 23, 1983, as Bill C-698. It has now been presented again, and the people of Aylmer are anxious to have the riding known as Aylmer-Hull instead of just Hull. Obviously, the purpose of the bill is to do these people a favour, since part of the Town of Aylmer is now included in the riding of Hull, and the member thinks that in order to identify the component parts of his riding, it would be better to call the riding Aylmer-Hull.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think the fact that the sponsor of the bill wishes to speak to the bill today may be considered an urgent reason. Therefore, leave is granted.

Motion agreed to.

SPORTS POOL

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

On the tabling of documents:

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): With respect to the tabling of documents, does the Leader of the Government in the Senate intend to table a copy of the Order in Council concerning the Sports Pool, or the government's definition of the word "lottery"?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Yes, that document will be tabled in due course. I do not have it with me today.

Senator Flynn: I would be very curious to see it.

Senator Olson: I probably will not have that document for a day or two, but I will convey the curiosity of the Leader of the Opposition to those responsible, and obtain that document as soon as possible.

Senator Flynn: You may be sure that there are also others who are curious.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the sitting of the Senate on Wednesday, May 16, 1984.

Motion agreed to.

(For text of report see Appendix, "A", p. 532)

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

FOURTH REPORT PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. William J. Petten, Chairman of the Committee of Selection, presented the following report:

FOURTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 66(1)(b), your committee submits herewith the list of Senators nominated by it to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs.

The Honourable Senators Asselin, Bosa, Donahoe, Guay, Hébert, Le Moyne, Murray, Thériault, Wood.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM J. PETTEN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

Motion agreed to.

HIS EXCELLENCY MIGUEL DE LA MADRID PRESIDENT OF MEXICO

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the address of His Excellency the President of Mexico to members of both Houses of Parliament, delivered today, May 8, 1984, together with the introductory speech by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada and the speeches delivered by the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

[Senator Flynn.]

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at 4 p.m. today, while the Senate is sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit tomorrow, Wednesday, May 9, 1984, while the Senate is sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, a meeting of this committee is scheduled for tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock. There will also be a meeting of the Committee on National Defence at four o'clock. The Chairman of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has arranged for a briefing session with departmental officials on the shipping conferences legislation, when probably a decision will also be made about scheduling the committee's meetings.

This is in line with our informal rule that only one committee should be sitting at the same time as the Senate. However, it was our plan to adjourn as early as possible Wednesday afternoon, and this also applies to the other committee, even tomorrow morning. That is why permission is being sought to allow the committee to meet at two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE-CANADIANS—MOTION RE GOVERNMENT APOLOGY
AND COMPENSATION—STATEMENT BY SPEAKER

The Hon. the Speaker: On April 10, 1984, the Honourable Senator Grafstein gave notice of a motion which was preceded by a preamble. The Honourable Senator Frith raised a point of order pursuant to Rule 22 and suggested that I recommend to the mover of the motion to withdraw the said preamble so that the motion might be put in accordance with the Rules of the Senate.

If the Honourable Senator Grafstein agrees, pursuant to citation 397 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 5th Edition, to amend his notice of motion by withdrawing the three paragraphs of the preamble, we will be able to proceed with the notice of motion as amended.

[English]

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: I agree and I will do that, Mr. Speaker.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

VACANCY

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the vacant position of Comptroller General of Canada. The minister will recall that the position was established as a result of recommendations made by the Auditor General. The minister will also know that the incumbent was appointed recently as Deputy Minister of National Revenue. I would like the minister to let us know whether it is the government's intention to retain the position as it is or, alternatively, whether the government had in mind having the Comptroller General's Office absorbed by some other department. Secondly, I should like to know what the intentions of the government are with respect to the appointment of a replacement for or a successor to Mr. Rodgers.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should advise at the outset that before we recessed Senator Leblanc asked a question which while it was not identical was the same subject matter, and I have to tell both Senator Leblanc and Senator Murray that I do not have a reply today. I have heard nothing to indicate that that office was going to be absorbed by another department. However, I shall refer that question in order to get a more specific answer.

PARLIAMENT HILL

LANDSCAPING

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government or to his deputy. I was one of those who did not leave Ottawa during the Easter recess and, therefore, had a ringside seat to what I consider a gross act of desecration on these Parliament Hill grounds. One day I saw numerous beautiful pine trees uprooted and torn out and discovered that the lovely tulips which were an adornment to this place and which brought joy to Canadians and visitors for many years were also torn out. I have since heard that the reason for this environmental desecration is that someone has decided that we are going to have a Son et Lumière presentation on Parliament Hill. I cannot tell from the news reports whether it is going to cost $2.3 million or whether it is going to cost $2 million or $3 million. But having regard to the way this government spends money, neither figure would surprise me. After all, one of their ancestors said "What's a million anyway?"

I was embarrassed when Canadians asked me what was going on and I could not answer them but could only observe the desecration before me. So, I wish to know when it was decided that this should be done, by whom it was decided and, above all else, why it was decided.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: Apparently, we have something else that is not appropriate upon the grounds of a democratic Parliament. We are going to have a two-level system of citizenship—those who pay may sit and the other poor characters will stand to watch the Son et Lumière. As Harry Truman, who was born 100 years ago today, would have said: "It is one of the damndest things I have ever heard of."

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that Senator Macquarrie's comments are perhaps inappropriate until he gets an answer to the first part of his question, but since he intends to condemn in the absence of information, that is his choice. However, I will take the serious part of his question and try to get an explanation—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Which part is the serious part?

Senator Olson: —to fill in those details that he does not already know about because, obviously, he has already made some inquiries.

● (1420)

I would also suggest to him that when changes to improve the grounds are undertaken, whatever they may be, there are always a few days during which there is some dislocation of what has been set for a long time, including trees and tulips. Everyone regrets that, but we also know that if necessary changes are to be made, the construction crew has no choice but to do carefully what, I think, they are doing very carefully.

Senator Macquarrie: Although the minister may undertake the research necessary to supply the answer, I can say that the two items whose absence I have deplored have already disappeared, namely, the beautiful pine trees and the tulips. My reaction to that does not have to wait upon a reply from the minister. I think it was a very bad environmental move, in fact, an outrageous and disgraceful one. We will see whether my figures are right or wrong.

As for knowing a little about the answer, John Diefenbaker told me 20 years ago that you should never stand up to ask a question if you do not know the answer.

Senator Olson: I had suspected that to be the basis of Senator Macquarrie's modus operandi; now it is confirmed.

Senator Flynn: We always know the answer because the Leader of the Government never gives us any.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: As a supplementary question, I would point out that, for about eight or nine years, I have been trying to persuade a succession of Speakers—although I have not yet approached the present one—to have some trees planted on the east side of the Parliament Buildings to partially conceal those office buildings that were erected in Hull several years ago from those of us who walk up from the Chateau Laurier—a beautiful walk. There are trees on the west side of the Parliament Buildings, but nothing has been done on the east side.

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, while inquiring about cutting trees down, to make some inquiries about the possibility of having some trees planted in a suitable location on the east side.

Senator Olson: I could do that, but I am afraid I would not agree with the reasons Senator Godfrey puts forward for having the trees planted because I think there is a beautiful view of the river. In any event, I will make the inquiry.

Senator Godfrey: The view of the river is beautiful and should not be interfered with, but my concern arises because we can see those big office buildings.

Senator Olson: It is in the same direction.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and, for his peace of mind, I would point out that it is not one to which I know the answer.

If we are to spend an indeterminate amount of $2 million or $3 million or $2.3 million, in order to have a Son et Lumière at the Parliament Buildings, ostensibly, as I understood from the Leader of the Government, to enhance the buildings and to improve their use and their appearance for the benefit of the people of Canada, is it the intention of the government to continue to allow the presence of the so-called "peace camp" on the front steps leading up to the Parliament Buildings?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a pretty complex question for a number of reasons. My honourable friend knows that a lot of members of Parliament and other citizens have been less than happy—I think that is the better way of putting it—by the presence of that peace camp. However, there is also such a thing as respect for Canadian citizens' right to protest, which is a valid right in this country.

If the honourable senator so wishes, I could direct a question to the Minister of Public Works who is in charge of the grounds. I will try to obtain an answer with respect to that.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Senator Donahoe: As a further supplementary, would the minister, at the same time that he is seeking that information, also be kind enough to see if an anti-abortion group would have the same privileges as the anti-missile group? Is there any limit to the number of groups which may seek such support and have it granted to them? I am sincere in wanting to have an answer to these questions.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the question raises some speculation as to the sort of rules or preconditions the honourable senator wishes be applied.

Senator Donahoe: The government makes the rules, I do not. I only want to know what they are.

Senator Olson: No, the government does not make the rules. The Parliament of Canada makes the rules as to the kind of activity in which Canadians will be allowed to involve themselves respecting protests and that sort of thing.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, in view of the questions asked by Senator Macquarrie and others, would the Leader of the Government also look into the matter of a report from the security service pertaining to what has taken place on the grounds of Parliament Hill?

Senator Olson: I am sure that Senator Guay intended some more precision to his question than what I have gathered from it. As I understand it, it is a general question on security with respect to this matter. It seemed somewhat broad or ambiguous. Perhaps he could help me by clarifying the point a little more.

Senator Flynn: You were describing your reply.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to pose a question to the Leader of the Government in relation to the beautification, the enhancement and the aesthetics of the area in front of the Parliament Buildings. I would like to know whether the tulip beds, the trimmed pine bushes and the lilac bushes are to be replaced by bleachers?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will inquire into the matter. Perhaps I will get enough information so that honourable senators may know what the plan is at the present time in terms of re-designing those areas that have been disturbed.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Would the minister, at some point, bring in a considered statement as to the attitude of the government on the status of the Parliament Buildings? Is it the view of the government that the grounds and the Parliament Buildings fall into the same category as does any other government building and therefore can be altered at the total discretion of the government? Is there not some obligation on the part of the government to consult members of both chambers of Parliament, before undertaking a work such as that which we are discussing this afternoon?

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators, I could make such an inquiry, although I think that it is generally accepted that the government has responsibility for a number of things, including maintenance and administration.

Senator Flynn: Maintenance, yes.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I should first like to ask the Leader of the Government whether, in this case, where a fairly major change is being made, the National Capital Commission is involved? Secondly, will this beautification or desecration program result in the elimination of the Changing of the Guard on the lawn in front of the Parliament Buildings each summer morning?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will have to take that question as notice because I do not know the relationship between the modifications or activities that have been described and the Changing of the Guard that normally takes place each morning during July and August.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

STATEMENT OF AMERICAN AMBASSADOR

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I should like to quote from the first three paragraphs of a report which appeared in the Sunday, April 29, 1984, issue of the Toronto Star. The report was headlined: "Energy Program Disaster for Canada U. S. Envoy Says." The report states:

The National Energy Program is 'a disaster' that any new government will change, U. S. ambassador Paul Robinson says.

Robinson said the government's controversial policy—intended to promote exploration, energy self-sufficiency and greater Canadian control of the oil industry—was a mistake that will not be repeated.

'It is a disaster for Canada,' he said. 'It hasn't achieved what was expected and hoped of it. I think this government or any other government would do it differently if they had to do it over again!'

My question is: What steps does the government intend to take with respect to this latest outrageous interference by the American ambassador in the internal politics of this country? Might I suggest that he be told to either shut up or go back to Chicago where, as a private citizen, he is at perfect liberty to make any comments he may wish.

● (1430)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senator Godfrey has pointed out, the American ambassador's statement was carried in the press approximately two weeks ago and therefore I have had time to make inquiries and can provide a precise answer to the honourable senator's question, of which he was kind enough to give me notice.

Ambassador Robinson has now been in Canada for approximately three years, and we are familiar with his views on certain issues in the relationship, and also with the manner in which he chooses to express them.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has met with Secretary Shultz at least four times each year since they assumed their current positions. They believe they have made progress on the issues that Ambassador Robinson has raised, and that this has contributed to an improvement in the overall state of the relationship.

On the National Energy Program, Secretary Shultz and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have narrowed their differences. Mr. MacEachen has told him that the NEP is no more retroactive in its application than many other measures taken by a substantial number of countries around the world, including the United States, which introduced a windfall profits tax.

He has also made it clear that the government believes that the NEP represents an attractive regime for Canadian and foreign investors, and that the current pace of activity in crown lands demonstrates this very clearly.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It ought to, at 80 cents.

Senator Godfrey: As a supplementary, I should point out that Ambassador Robinson did not confine himself to that part of the National Energy Program providing for the 25 per cent back in, to which we all know they have objected for some time. He made a general sweeping statement about the whole program, and that is what I am objecting to.

Senator Olson: I understood that very clearly, and if the honourable senator will read the answer I have given, he will see there a clear, precise and targeted response to that general application.

COMMUNICATIONS

SASKATCHEWAN—TELEVISION SIGNAL-RECEIVING DISHES

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. Representation has been made to me in Saskatchewan, particularly from people in the northeastern part of the province, regarding the problem created by a group of small town individuals and farmers in the general area who, because of some misunderstanding in the application of the CRTC rules regarding communication signal-receiving dishes, have organized themselves into a co-op and, by purchasing a receiving dish they bring in programs from outside stations which otherwise would not be available in those remote areas.

Honourable senators may have seen an article on this subject published recently in the press. The RCMP has now threatened such individuals with substantial fines of up to $1,000 per day.

There seems to be a good deal of confusion, not on the part of the minister or the CRTC who have formulated certain regulations, but in the interpretation of those regulations.

My question is: Would the minister present a report to the Senate as soon as possible on the situation and indicate whether the problem can be resolved? The people involved feel that they are providing themselves with a source of entertainments to be of people who are more closely related to the industry, such as somebody from the unions or somebody from the west coast or central part of Newfoundland. My question is: Why were all the appointees from St. John's and why were interest if something could be done to meet the situation through the goodwill of the minister and the CRTC.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at the outset I wish to say that although I am not completely familiar with the situation, I have seen a number of press reports to which Senator Buckwold has referred, attempting—however accurately, I do not know—to convey the views of people in the area who, as the honourable senator has said, are taking a practical approach to obtain those signals, which is resulting in conflict with the CRTC and other regulations. I shall try to get an answer soon but it may take some time because a very intense effort is being made to accomplish the desirable course of action Senator Buckwold has indicated.

NEWFOUNDLAND

ICE STORM—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO VICTIMS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It has to do with the ice storm last month which caused considerable damage in the province of Newfoundland. In the other place, the government house leader has indicated to an honourable member from Newfoundland that the government will do all it can to alleviate the situation and assist the population of Newfoundland. In view of the urgency of the matter, would the Leader of the Government obtain a more detailed reply indicating what action the government intends to take under the federal Disaster Financial Assistance Program to correct the situation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will do as Senator Marshall requested but I do not think that he really believes that I can get an answer any quicker than the minister who took the question in the other place. That minister and I will probably receive the answer at about the same time, and I shall try to convey it to the Senate at that time.

Senator Marshall: It has been a couple of weeks since the question was asked. I am sure that the house leader's office is efficient enough to have an answer by this time. Of course, the reason I did not ask the question earlier is that we were not sitting.

FISHERY PRODUCTS INTERNATIONAL LTD.

APPOINTMENTS TO BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin dealing with the appointments to the Board of Directors of Fishery Products International Ltd. I understand that four very capable men have been appointed along with Mr. Andrew Crosbie. I would expect some of the appointment which otherwise would not be available. It is correct that such people are contravening CRTC regulations. However, the matter is of some importance to a large number of people who live in that part of the province and it would be of great appointments not made to reflect a broader scope of the industry?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, 60 per cent of Fishery Products International Limited is held by the federal government, 25 per cent is held by the Province of Newfoundland and the remainder by the Bank of Nova Scotia. The bank has the right to appoint one director, the province to appoint three directors and the federal government to appoint five directors. I can only speak on the five federally appointed directors. Of those five directors three are from the province of Newfoundland, one resides in Winnipeg—Peter Moss, former President and Chief Executive Officer of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Board—and the final federal director is Mr. Joel Bell, President of Canada Development Investment Corporation. The desire of all the shareholders in the appointment of directors to FPI was to give that company a sound commercial business-like board. It is necessary for that board of directors to meet frequently in its current efforts to rebuild FPI. Mr. Andrew Crosbie has been appointed as the interim chairman. He is one of the federal directors from Newfoundland along with Mr. Hickman and Mr. Tilley.

The company is very actively involved in its restructuring and in developing a new corporate and business plan. Consideration was given by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Honourable Pierre De Bané, and Premier Peckford to the appointment of a director from among the labour unions. Indeed, the shareholders' agreement of September 26, 1983, contains as part of the total labour package, provision for a labour appointment provided the unions wish to become members of an incentives system under which they would earn equity in the company. Consequently one vacancy remains on the Board of Directors in the event that offer is taken up.

IMMIGRATION

MARRIAGES OF CONVENIENCE—OFFICIAL DISCRETION

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. According to press reports today the federal cabinet has approved new rules which would allow the Department of Immigration to make what appear to me to be subjective decisions respecting the question of marriages of convenience. These are marriages which are arranged making it easier for people to immigrate to Canada.

The report in this morning's paper gave the impression that there will be a great deal of discretion allowed immigration officers with respect to this matter. At the same time, there does not seem to be any protection with respect to what will obviously be subjective interpretations regarding whether or not someone has married for convenience. I wish to know what guidelines and rules will be given to immigration officers to follow in order to protect innocent parties from what could be a subjective and unfavourable definition of their marriage.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I expected a question in this regard and therefore sought a reply earlier today. Unfortunately, I do not have it with me. I will take the honourable senator's question as notice and try to obtain a response.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What else is new?

Senator Olson: There are a great many things that are new. However, since the Leader of the Opposition likes to have precise and complete answers—

Senator Flynn: Yes, that is right.

Senator Olson: In keeping with his wishes, I will try to accommodate him.

Senator Flynn: Yes. No matter what time you take you are never able to provide that type of answer.

Senator Olson: That is according to your interpretation.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Murray on April 4, 1984, as to whether a reply tabled in the Senate on April 3 to a question asked on March 22 represented the view of the government or whether it came from the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

The answer tabled on April 3 concerning interest rate developments represents the view of the government—in this case, the Minister of Finance who usually makes the views of the government known with respect to matters of this nature.

ECONOMIC AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND GENERAL DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on April 10, 1984 concerning when the Canada-Newfoundland General Development Agreement would be signed.

The answer is that the Canada-Newfoundland Economic and Regional Development Agreement which replaces the General Development Agreement was signed on May 4, 1984. The implications with respect to sub-agreements are apparent in the question also. However, I do not have a reply with respect to that matter, except to say that I do not believe any of the sub-agreements have been signed to date. Just the umbrella agreement has been signed.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I found that out yesterday.

Senator Olson: Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition will have a little sympathy for me now that some of his backbench members seem to have a speedier research capability than I.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a great deal of sympathy for you, there is no doubt about that.

OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

VACANCY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Leblanc on April 17 last concerning the appointment of a new Comptroller General. This delayed answer is also in reply to a question asked earlier today by Senator Murray.

I am informed that the appointment of a new Comptroller General is still under consideration. I would be pleased to inform Senators Leblanc and Murray as soon as an announcement is made by the Prime Minister about this appointment.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is a clear answer!

THE CONSTITUTION

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—SELF-GOVERNMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Gigantes on February 14, 1984 concerning government policy toward providing increased self-government for Canada's native peoples. It is a rather lengthy reply and I ask that it be incorporated into the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

It is not the government's policy to in any way block the developments referred to by the Honourable Senator. On the contrary, as is being demonstrated both in the constitutional setting as well as in response to the Report on Indian Self-Government, the government and its officials are actively seeking the kind of changes necessary for greater self-government for Indians and Inuit.

It must be recognized however, that the processes that have been established to effect these changes are themselves constrained by the need to reach agreement with the aboriginal peoples, as well as with the provinces. Whatever changes do take place in the constitutional setting will of necessity be on the basis of agreement.

On the question concerning the views of public servants, I can only agree with the Honourable Senator that paternalism is behind us. No action by the government could attest to this more strongly than the statement by the Minister of Indian Affairs in response to the Report on Indian Self-Government. Honourable Senators will note that the heart of the government's position is a firm commitment to greater Indian self-government, and that developments taken in furtherance of this goal will in all respects be made jointly with Indian peoples themselves.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second Reading of the Bill C-12, intituled: "An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977".—(Honourable Senator Olson P.C.).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I propose that this order stand until tomorrow.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT

BILL C-205, TO CHANGE THE NAME OF THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF HULL—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill C-205, to change the name of the electoral district of Hull.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill was first introduced in November 1983, when it died on the Order Paper, and now it is Bill C-205, and the member for Hull, Dr. Isabelle, gave as an explanation on both occasions that the purpose of this bill concerning the constituency of Hull is to add the name of Aylmer. The new federal electoral district of Hull includes the electors of only two cities, Hull and Aylmer. It would therefore be logical and justifiable if indeed the electors involved were to be identified and known under a distinctive name which includes them all, namely the electoral district of Hull-Aylmer.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I will move the adjournment of the debate in order to repeat briefly tomorrow why I am against this type of bill. Mostly, it will be to give Senator Lafond an opportunity to speak, because he too is against this type of bill. He will find himself in a very special situation since he comes from the district of Hull. Under those circumstances, I would like the Senate to benefit from his opinion and his reaction.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE-CANADIANS—MOTION RE GOVERNMENT APOLOGY
AND COMPENSATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein, pursuant to notice of April 10, 1984, moved:

That the Senate of Canada endorses, on behalf of all Canadians, the position that a formal apology be extended by the Government of Canada to those living Canadians of Japanese descent for the acts of incarceration of such individuals and the confiscation of their businesses and properties made during the Second World War; and recommends that:

(1) the Government should consider the advisability of appointing a Special Claims Commissioner to adjudicate partial compensation for claims made by living Canadians of Japanese descent for the loss of their businesses or properties as a result thereof; and

(a) that such claims for partial compensation be received by the Claims Commissioner for a period of one year from the date of proclamation of the Act establishing the same;

(b) that $50 million be allocated by the Government in the aggregate for all such claims;

(c) that the balance of any such $50 million be returned to the Government when the Commission completes its responsibilities; and

(2) the Government take the necessary steps to ensure that any personal records or fingerprints of Canadians of Japanese descent obtained and kept by police officials, if any, during the Second World War be destroyed forthwith.

He said: Honourable senators, before addressing the substance of the motion, with your leave perhaps I might address some personal perambulatory remarks of self-introduction.

Honourable senators, I come from a "proud and stiff-necked" people and have been brought to this place, not by my efforts alone but by the contributions of many who sit in this chamber and elsewhere. Early in my life, my late father, a gentle man, taught me almost daily four lessons which still, to this moment, are as difficult for me to practice as I should: The joy of learning, the importance of tradition and family and the pursuit of humility. As we studied together, he would gently ask me, "And why do you say that?" Now, honourable senators, my wife and sons act as my daily professors in that illusive quest for happiness.

From the late Cecil Augustus Wright, one of Canada's great law teachers, I learned of:

The importance of law as a vehicle of reform, and that, fragile as reason is, and limited as the law is as the expression of the institutionalized medium of reason, that is all we have standing between us and the tyranny of mere will and the cruelty of unbridled, undisciplined feeling.

These words by Mr. Justice Frankfurter, repeated by Dean Wright at the opening of the University of Toronto Faculty of Law in 1962, were stamped on the minds of all law students who were privileged to be taught by the great "Caesar" Wright, that great man with an original mind.

When I turn to Prime Minister Trudeau, who brought me to this place, I must express my debt for his oscillating intellectual inspiration. My admiration escalates daily as I watch him close at hand, now from a vantage point here in Ottawa, wrestling with the demanding burdens of governance. In his enigmatic way, the Prime Minister defines for all of us the issues of the day. Through the exercise of his extraordinary political will, our Constitution was repatriated and our Charter of Rights entrenched. We are now free in law from the last vestiges of colonialism that stultified our minds and stunted our spirit. By this political act, he forced us, as Canadians, to face up and grow up to the tasks of political maturity. "British" justice has finally been transplanted by our own brand of home-made Canadian justice.

As for others in this chamber, I am greatly indebted to Senator Keith Davey, a grand friend who taught me the joy of politics and the excitement of participatory democracy. I am grateful to Senator Daniel Lang, who taught me the importance of graceful precision of political planning and execution; to Senator Charles McElman, who teaches us all that liberalism grows with age rather than diminishes; to Senator Croll, with whose firm I articulated as a green student of law and who continues to carry the torch, if flickering from time to time, of the underprivileged; to Senator Paul Lafond who, at a critical juncture, assisted me in the promotion of the Journal of Liberal Thought which, in the 1960s, was crucial to my own intellectual and political development.

I am grateful to Senator Andrew Thompson whose geniality, wit and commitment served as a vanguard for all young men first embarking upon the sea of public life; to Senator Lorna Marsden, who taught me to fight against my traditional biases respecting the role of women in politics and the necessity, indeed the importance, of first reforming one's own mind set and then semantics in seeking their equal rights and their treatment; to Senator Richard Stanbury who, as President of the York Centre Liberal Association, where I first started my serious political activity in Metro Toronto and who, later, as the President of the Liberal Party of Canada, was, for me, the personification of liberal fairness.

I am grateful to Senator Lowell Murray, an honourable, self-effacing political opponent whom I have always respected for his skill and commitment both to the political process and to Canada. More recently, I am grateful to Senator Robert Muir for his gracious words of wisdom and welcome to this chamber; to Senator Royce Frith, who stands out always for me as the exemplar of sartorial and linguistic elegance; to Senator Austin for his political encouragement and comradeship and to Senators Godfrey, Bosa and Cools who personify for me, each in his or her own wonderful way, the best and diverse qualities, the exciting faces and the voices that make up the boisterous cacophony and vibrant collage known as Metropolitan Toronto, the metropolis I so proudly now represent. Metropolitan Toronto, where the majority of the heads of households speak a first language other than English and French, has become a new, free-form model, a unique, resonating, harmonious city of the world which relishes and respects individual expression and human dignity.

I would like to point out other senators in this chamber for whom I have had a distant yet deep respect: Senator David Steuart, one of the great political orators of the west; Senator Robichaud, who at an earlier time and in a different place, expressed with fire and eloquence a passion for equality that has yet to be matched in Canadian public life.

Among today's senators, I would like to pay tribute to Senator Roblin who, by his fairness and grace, personifies for me the best qualities of character and intelligence that I see so evident and at such surplus in this chamber.

To you and to other senators, I owe a debt, but today I should like to turn to the question of a larger debt that we, as a nation, owe to a group of Canadians who, by the awful arm of government and by reason only of their race, were uprooted and deprived of their freedom, their businesses, their homes, and separated from their families and from their dignity. That is a debt that we should repay and it is to that debt that I wish to address my first full remarks to this chamber.

The following are only certain of the salient facts giving rise to this grievance. Let me take you back, if I can, for a moment to 1941. In 1941, 95 per cent of Canada's Japanese population, 22,000 people, lived in British Columbia. Of these, 60 per cent, or 13,600, were Canadians by birth. Another 14 per cent, or 3,650, were naturalized citizens, most of very long standing.

While more than half resided in urban areas of British Columbia, the rest were spread along the coast and the interior. Yet these were different Canadian citizens. They could not vote in British Columbia by reason of a restriction in the British Columbian and federal statutes prohibiting citizens of Japanese origin or Asian origin from voting. Excepted only from those restrictions were war veterans who had been allowed the vote. Canadian citizens of Japanese descent suffered from silent restrictions in businesses, all occupations, trades and professions. There were expressed restrictions against them so that they could not work as federal or provincial civil servants, lawyers or teachers, and the list goes on. They were limited as to their landholdings and were given quotas on logging and fishing rights based purely on race. Labour unions shared the prevailing bigotry of the day by excluding them from union membership. Of course, as Canadian citizens, they were not restricted from paying their taxes.

● (1500)

British Columbia and other parts of Canada were simply not congenial to those of Japanese ancestry by restrictive practices, bylaws, land covenants, regulations, business permits and attitude. Racism was alive in Canada in 1941, fertilized by government, politicians and the press.

Early that year, on January 8, 1941, Prime Minister King announced to the House of Commons that Canadians of Japanese ancestry were exempted from military service, thereby further foreclosing their opportunity to get the vote.

On Sunday, December 7, 1941—that infamous Sunday—the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbour. Within hours the Canadian war cabinet declared war on Japan, and immediately issued a statement expressing confidence in the loyalty of Canadians of Japanese descent. Within hours officials of the United States government and officials from the Canadian government met and agreed to "concert their efforts" on what they called the "Japanese problem" in both countries.

Early on December 8—the day after Pearl Harbour—1,200 fishing vessels owned by Canadians and others of Japanese descent were impounded by the Royal Canadian Navy. The owners fully co-operated. The CPR Railway—which had been built with the help of cheap oriental labour—followed by other leading businesses began to discharge Canadians of Japanese origin. Second-generation Canadian-Japanese, called Nisei, wrote Prime Minister King affirming their loyalty. They repeated the requests they had made since war had broken out in 1939 to volunteer for active military service. Those requests went unanswered.

By order in council dated December 16, 1941, all persons of Japanese origin, whether Canadian citizens or not, were required to register with the Registrar of Enemy Aliens. No such steps were taken against Canadians of German or Italian descent, despite the fact that we had declared war on Germany and Italy two years earlier.

On December 25, Hong Kong fell and almost 2,000 Canadians were captured. Vitriolic opposition to all of Japanese origin was ignited and fanned by municipal, provincial and federal politicians, who urged the removal of all of Japanese origin from British Columbia.

On January 8, 1942, a conference was convened in Ottawa composed of federal, provincial and municipal politicians, together with public servants, including the RCMP, officials from the Department of External Affairs and members of the military general staff in Ottawa. All public servants, including members of the military, concurred in the RCMP's strong assessment that those of Japanese origin were loyal and represented no military or strategic threat to Canada. This strong recommendation cut no ice with the politicians. Ultimately, after a bitter debate, a recommendation was made that Japanese male aliens aged 18 to 45 be evacuated from designated areas, those areas being approximately 100 miles along the British Columbia coast, that fishing vessels owned by those of Japanese ancestry, whether Canadian citizens or not, be sold to non-Japanese, and that there be a prohibition from holding fishing licences. Escott Reid, a distinguished public servant, who was an official in attendance, later wrote in his memoirs of that conference that he felt "evil" in the room because of the patent racism and the racist decisions taken despite the clear facts.

From that conference followed a chain reaction of events fanned by the winds of war. Based on the conference recommendation and heated strong representations from B.C. politicians at all levels of government, an order in council dated January 16, 1942, was issued under the War Measures Act authorizing the Minister of Defence to evacuate from protected areas residents who were enemy aliens, restricting them only to their possessions of personal property and articles approved by the RCMP. Two thousand alien Japanese men were evacuated to road camps in the interior of British Columbia. That order in council also authorized the sale of the fishing vessels owned by the Japanese aliens. The first order referred only to aliens and did not designate others such as Canadians of Japanese origin. But no difference, all vessels owned by Japanese, whether Canadian citizens or not, were impounded and sold. However, this action still did not satisfy local B.C. politicians who continued to lobby actively for more drastic measures against all those of Japanese origin. No distinction was made as to whether they were aliens or citizens; all those of Japanese origin were included.

In February, Singapore fell. On February 19, 1942, the American government ordered the removal of 110,000 men, women and children of Japanese ancestry from American Pacific coastal areas, increasing the pressure on the federal cabinet to take sterner steps. Rumours of enemy attacks and enemy sitings, which were dispelled by the military, further inflamed public opinion, always egged on by B.C. political leaders at all levels of government.

At that time Prime Minister King and the cabinet were concerned about another emotional issue which was dividing the entire country, the conscription question. Subsequent analysis suggests that King considered further steps against Canadians of Japanese ancestry as just another tactical weapon to help him in his political strategy to diffuse the hot conscription issue and gain public support wherever and whenever he could. He was down in the polls and he knew it. Be that as it may, by order in council dated February 24, 1942, the Minister of Justice was given the power to require any person to leave the restricted or protected areas. That general order was followed by a specific order of the Minister of Justice, then the Honourable Louis St. Laurent, ordering "every person of Japanese race" to evacuate the protected areas.

That was followed by yet another order in council, dated March 4, 1942, evacuating all persons of Japanese descent. Included in that order was section 12, which stated that "as a protective measure only" all property owned in such protected areas, except the fishing vessels and the cash and securities, was to be vested in the Custodian of Alien Property and kept under his management and control—again, I repeat, "as a protective measure."

The British Columbia Securities Commission—a great name—was created by Order in Council dated March 14, 1942, to supervise the evacuation and place all the property that could not be carried by the evacuees into the trust and custody of the custodian. Thus, a group of Canadian citizens were dispossessed and their property confiscated without due process purely on the grounds of racial discrimination. No one, not even the members of the CCF Party, at that time raised a voice of objection. The political opposition was silent. The press was silent. The churches were silent as the dispersal and dispossession of Canadians and the confiscation of their property took place.

By the middle of 1942, after the battle of Midway on June 6, 1942, it was clear that Japan could not win the war. The Japanese advances had been stopped in the Pacific. The Japanese war threat was ended in the middle of 1942. Yet by the end of 1942 virtually the bulk of the population of those of Japanese ancestry was moved. Many families were separated, except those families which were moved to sugar beet farms on the prairies and elsewhere in the east. Others were sent to six camps located in the interior of British Columbia. Provincial authorities did not provide educational facilities. Makeshift educational facilities had to be set up in the camps by the evacuees themselves. Universities throughout Canada, for all practical purposes, were closed to those Canadians eligible to enroll in courses. Sustenance remuneration was given, from which room and board was deducted.

By order in council dated January 19, 1943, the government changed its mind. Now the Custodian was empowered to liquidate or otherwise dispose of the property that had been originally vested in him as "a protective measure" only under the order in council dated March 14, 1942, issued almost a year earlier.

This finally alerted public opinion and the opposition now pleaded unfairness. These pleas were unheeded by the government. The property was liquidated by various methods, admittedly on unfavourable terms and conditions that minimized rather than maximized the return. On the average, not more than 10 per cent of the replacement value was obtained. By order in council of February 5, 1943, the Minister of Labour was empowered to relocate those of Japanese origin. Some of the able-bodied males of these families began to disperse to the east when they recognized that their homes and businesses would never be returned nor would they be fully compensated.

As the war drew to a close in August 1944, Prime Minister King addressed the House of Commons, declaring in these words: "It is a fact that no person of Japanese race or born in Canada has been charged with any act of sabotage or any act of disloyalty during the years of the war."

Now, suddenly, due to urgent requests received from the British military, 150 Nisei Canadians were finally allowed to enter active service in the spring of 1945. They did so primarily as members in the intelligence and as interpreters, and they served with distinction in the Far East.

But what to do with those left in the camps? Four thousand had by now relocated throughout the east. But the young, the elderly, young women and others without work skills, who had not already dispersed—the great majority—were still left in the camps. Prime Minister King had a plan. To allow them to return to the protected areas along the coast might cause some political problems. Again the federal government acted. First, a resolution of Parliament to prevent Canadian citizens of Japanese descent in the east from voting in federal elections. Then an order of the Minister of Labour dated March 12, 1944, in which Canadians of Japanese descent were given two choices—either to be deported at their request or to be relocated east of the Rockies. Free transit and allowances were to be granted for those who chose relocation east. These Canadians were given six weeks to make up their minds. Then an order in council dated December 15, 1944, stipulated that persons of Japanese origin who so requested were to be deported to Japan. Now the opposition in Parliament finally raised full alarms. The public knew the threat of war had passed. Cries were heard in Parliament that the deportation order was contrary to the will of Parliament. Nevertheless, deportations commenced and continued. It should be noted that these decisions took place after the end of the war in the Pacific.

Even the formal end of the war in 1945 was not the end of injustices against these Canadians of Japanese origin. Only after battles through the courts up to the Privy Council, which supported the government's powers to deport, and public outcry heard in Parliament and elsewhere, did the government finally cave in in January 1947 and agree to discontinue the deportation policy. Deportation orders, however, continued until they were formally revoked in April 1947, some two years after the formal end of the war.

The other orders in council which lapsed under the War Measures Act in 1945 were continued under the National Emergencies Transitional Powers Act of 1945. It was not until 1949 that the orders in Council prohibiting Canadians of Japanese descent—Canadian citizens—from re-entering the protective areas of British Columbia lapsed. Thus, Canadian citizens had been restricted in their own country for seven years, four years of which were after the end of World War II.

It now became evident, based on the hearings held by the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons in 1947, and active representation by the Japanese community in Canada and others, that the enforced liquidation by the Custodian of alien properties originally ordered to be held under protective custody, was unfair as to the timing, the method and the quantum of certain property sales.

The House of Commons committee focused on certain transactions. Specifically, they examined sales of farmlands to the Veterans Land Act authorities in 1943, which were to be purchased for use by returning war veterans. The best farmland in Canada, located in the Fraser Valley, sold for $64 per acre. Even then, that was a pittance. What delicious British justice! Some of these farms were confiscated from Canadian citizens of Japanese origin who were World War I veterans, to be turned over to returning Canadian war veterans of World War II. The House of Commons committee came to the conclusion that the compensation was unfair and grossly undervalued. It recommended that a royal commission be established to investigate alleged losses. When proceeds were forwarded from time to time by the Custodian to those in the camps, their living allowances were deducted from such proceeds. In the end, in many, many instances only paltry sums finally reached the property owners.

A court attempt in 1947 to make the Custodian a Crown agent, and therefore accountable to the Exchequer Court Act, failed. The court decided that the Custodian was not a servant of the Crown and was therefore not accountable, if you can believe it, before the Exchequer Court. Representations continued, which, added to the recommendations of the House of Commons committee, led to the appointment of a royal commission in 1947 under Mr. Justice Bird of British Columbia to review the compensation question. His terms of reference were so restricted as to be unfair. Compensation terms were broadened ever so slightly raising expectations of the National Japanese Canadian Citizens Committee and the Co-operative Committee to participate. They did so in the belief that the evidence they gathered would lead to a full and fair compensation based on fair terms of reference. However, value was determined at the date of sales regardless of market and other depressing conditions, and nothing at all was ever allowed for goodwill and business. Finally, to expedite the lengthy hearings that went on until 1950, settlement was based on arbitrary percentages allotted to certain categories of property. The decision of the royal commission was finally handed down in 1950. The community committees that collaborated never felt that the Bird Commission would be an end to their claims to just compensation.

Subsequent analysis determined that not more than a range of between 11 to 16 per cent of the market value of only certain property claims were granted in the aggregate by proceeds received both from the Custodian and from the Bird Commission. Settlements were made—by the way, without any interest—for the intervening years, because they were desperately in need of funds after eight years and it was their belief that further fuller claims would be granted. Of course, the sustenance allowances were deducted from even these partial proceeds. No further steps were ever taken by the government to remedy the situation despite repeated claims by community groups to remedy injustices suffered by these citizens.

Four categories of claims of property still exist to this date. First, those receiving partial compensation ranging from 11 to 16 per cent who accepted funds from the Custodian and the Bird Commission in the honest belief that further and fuller compensation would be authorized; second, no compensation whatsoever for personal property and family heirlooms entrusted to the Custodian "as a protective measure" which just disappeared; third, marginal or no compensation for the 1,200 fishing vessels impounded by the Royal Canadian Navy; and, fourth, no compensation whatsoever for numerous claims still lodged and unsettled with the government by those Canadians who refused to agree with the Custodian or the Bird Commission and whose files are still open and with the federal government to this day. No claims were ever awarded for incarceration or anything that ever approached replacement value for the property taken.

Honourable senators, I am indebted to three excellent and fair accounts of this period entitled The Politics of Racism by Ann Gomer Sunahara, The Enemy That Never Was by Ken Adachi, and Fragile Freedoms by Thomas R. Berger.

The Prime Minister has said that he is open to arguments on this question. He has assisted public debate by fairly and fully defining concerns shared by many Canadians. The Prime Minister argues forcefully and logically that this generation cannot and, indeed, should not, seek to redress past injustices. He argues that we must change the law and our practices today to correct the unjust practices of the past and to enable us to live in a better and fairer society now and in the future. Hence, he implies that our Constitution is properly prospective and not retrospective in its application. He argues that any other application would be costly and time consuming to the nation's agenda, bedevilled as it is by the overwhelming economic and social problems of today. He takes Bentham's utilitarian position that the costs to the majority by dredging up the evils of the past outweigh any benefits to the minority. What good would it do to stir up ancient animosities? We cannot repay the sins of our grandfathers, else we will be flooded with a widening cycle of demands. If we are to give financial compensation, where would it stop? he argues. Where do you draw the line? What about the Acadians? What about the Chinese head tax, and what about the imprisonment of Canadians of German and Italian origin during that same world war?

This is a perfectly legitimate and pragmatic, philosophical position for the Prime Minister and many other Canadians, who have argued that position, to take. Indeed, I share the same underlying pragmatism. We both share a concern for past injustices. We both share a concern that the law and society must be forward-looking. We both share a concern that the present generation cannot bear the undue financial burdens of the past. We are all worried about crowding the public agenda and draining the public purse with matters of little present importance.

But, honourable senators, this case is different. It stands alone. There are material, significant considerations and, I hopefully believe, persuasive principles alive in this case that simply make this a different, unique precedent. Not to differentiate cases of injustice by legal and philosophic tests is to plunge the law and politics into an abyss. To do so would be to condemn all definition of the public interest and all legal analysis to the gross balancing of interests and quantification. We shunt aside the ideal of justice—its means and its end—on to a rusty track of non-use and abuse. This is not a case of de minimis non curat lex.

Why then does this grievance so compel our attention and redress? Let me bring a decalogue of differences—ten different facts—to your attention:

First, these were acts done to Canadian citizens when they were Canadian citizens. This differs from the Chinese head tax question. We are dealing with living Canadians, living Canadian citizens. Of the approximately 22,000 Canadians of Japanese descent who were damaged by these acts, approximately 12,000 are still living in Canada.

Second, no evidence, no scintilla of evidence, was ever adduced of their disloyalty to king or country. Even Prime Minister King thrice repeated this. This differs from the Acadian affair and the FLQ crisis. We are told that of the 196 Canadians of Japanese descent who volunteered for military service in Canada during World War I, over 50 were wounded, 96 were killed, and 49 returned safely to Canada. Those 49 veterans who survived to World War II were treated equally: They were interned, dispossessed and dispersed with the others.

Third, there was no evidence of violence or threat of violence to the state ever demonstrated during or after the war.

Fourth, despite actions taken against them, positive acts of loyalty to Canada and the war effort permeated this community by their exemplary conduct, full co-operation and repeated attempts to volunteer for active service. Indeed, we are told that they invested over $300,000 of their meagre savings in Canada Savings Bonds.

Fifth, there was no notice, no public forewarning, given to enable them to voluntarily sell their property or rearrange their personal affairs.

Sixth, there was no recourse to the law. No "due process" to the courts was made available to them. This differs from the Riel affair, the Manitoba language rights question, the Acadian outrage, and even those who were incarcerated during the FLQ crisis. These Canadian citizens had simply no way to object through the courts.

Seventh, admittedly there was no full, fair compensation given for property or incarceration. Indeed, we are told that, despite the moneys received from the Custodian and later from the Bird Commission, not more than a range of 11 per cent to 16 per cent on the average was ever allotted for those property claims that were made. Many major claims sit in the government's file—yet to be settled—made by Canadians who refused the Custodian and the Bird Commission offers as being totally unjust. No final settlement was made for the Royal Canadian Navy's impounding of 1,200 fishing vessels.

Eighth, their initial trust in "British justice" and the government's express order in council that the property be "protected" by the Custodian led these Canadian citizens to leave their most cherished possessions and irreplaceable family heirlooms behind in their homes. These were never returned or never traced. No compensation at all was ever allotted.

Ninth, after the war, when no semblance of war threat could even be sustained, these Canadian citizens were still prevented, until 1949, from being able to return to the protected areas of British Columbia and their old neighbourhoods.

Tenth, and finally, most damning of all—no vote. These Canadian citizens were deprived of our most precious franchise—the right to vote, the right to choose. It was only on June 15, 1948, some six years after the 1942 order in council and four years after the end of World War II, that Parliament finally passed Bill 198 amending the Dominion Elections Act. This bill deleted the section which had disenfranchised all Canadians of the Japanese race except war veterans and those few resident outside British Columbia since 1902. The offending section of the Dominion Elections Act had specified that persons denied a provincial franchise were also to be denied a federal franchise. Those who make a claim for greater respect for provincial rights should review our history on this question. British Columbia had passed legislation in 1895 excluding all citizens of Asian origin. With the evacuation, the Japanese who moved outside British Columbia borders would have automatically gained the right to vote in federal elections, but the disqualification was continued in the notorious clause 5 of Bill 135 passed in 1944 by Parliament under the leadership of Mr. King. No vote. No choice. No vote until 1949. Reason: racism.

Returning to Prime Minister Trudeau's utilitarian argument, my concern is equally pragmatic. I believe, as I have said in the defeated preamble to this motion, that the Constitution, the Charter of Rights, reflects certain natural rights. These rights are not of recent origin, but were rights that were scorched into common law, in our statutes, in our conventions and in our practices. These rights, now made explicit in the charter, were basic rights which were and are inalienable. Certain new charter rights were added, but the rights here infringed pre-date the entrenchment of the charter. These rights are to be found expressed in Magna Carta. These rights deal with respect for the person and his property. These rights ultimately deal with the question of human dignity.

Respect for human dignity is the foundation of our legal system. Respect precedes rights. Duties and obligations come before rights. As Simone Weil has so eloquently written in her book, The Need for Roots, and obligation to respect human dignity precedes and is a precondition to the entertainment or enjoyment of human rights. Therefore, is it not appropriate, when an injustice appears, particularly this injustice that was done to these citizens by a Liberal government, that a Liberal government should act to redress these injustices?

If we do not have a collective conscience, if we do not have a sense of remorse, and if we do not look backward, how then can we justify supporting the present amendments to Manitoba laws which seek, in the name of a distinct numerical minority in Manitoba, to redress a historic and unjust grievance? In the 1940s, Canadians of Japanese origin represented just under 3 per cent of the British Columbia populace. Today, francophones in Manitoba represent 3 per cent of that province's populace. Both, then, are distinct numerical minorities. How do we support allocation of precious taxpayers' dollars for services to benefit that small minority today? Because this was a past injustice to that francophone group. Is it not a recognition that there was a disproportionate and unfair treatment before the law, that the democratic majority repressed their minority rights? Is not bilingualism in this country and the amendments to the Manitoba laws, which are a reflection of that bilingualism, an attempt by this generation of Canadians to correct injustices of the past, even though there is still only a very small francophone minority in Manitoba? Restitution by compensation is an essential element giving substance to theory—beef to the bone—in the same way that amendments to the Manitoba laws and the investment of taxpayers' dollars in francophone services is a manifestation of justice in action. Is this not the essence of distributive justice?

Would William Lyon Mackenzie King have led the Canadian government to do what it did had those Canadians of Japanese origin held the vote? Without the vote, they were disarmed; they were naked in politics. No vote, no franchise, was critical in the opinion of Jack Pickersgill who was at that time in 1942 Mr. King's executive assistant. Mr. Pickersgill said:

I have always felt that if the Japanese had had the vote it would not have happened the way it did... I don't think any Liberal government in the 1940s would have dared take the vote away from anyone.

● (1530)

By depriving those Canadians of our most cherished possession, the right to choose by vote, Canada deprived them of their implied consent, necessary in a democratic society to restrict their rights—take away the fruits of a subject's labour, or even isolate them—all in the interest of the greater good; all in the interest of the majority. There was no full democratic social contract entered into with these Canadians, these citizens. Yet they kept up their end of the social contract by their loyal actions. Deprivation of the vote places this case on a higher plane. Those Canadians had no opportunity to influence the majority with their vote. This is not the case now, in Manitoba, nor was it the case in the other instances given as a rationale—given as historic analogies—to curb redress.

In pressing for the principle of equality for French Canadians, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, then Minister of Justice, made a speech entitled, "Quebec and the Constitutional Problem," which he presented to the Canadian Bar Association in Quebec City on September 4, 1967. I would like to quote his words:

If French Canadians are able to claim equal partnership with English Canadians, and if their culture is established on a coast-to-coast basis, it is mainly because of the balance of linguistic forces within the country. Historical origins are less important than people generally think, the proof being that neither Eskimo nor Indian dialects have any kind of privileged position. On the other hand, if there were six million people living in Canada whose mother tongue was Ukrainian, it is likely that this language would establish itself as forcefully as French. In terms of realpolitik, French and English are equal in Canada because each of these linguistic groups has the power to break the country. And this power cannot yet be claimed by the Iroquois, the Eskimos, or the Ukrainians.

The Prime Minister, in that passage, was describing the classic case of the power of a strong minority backed by substantial numbers. Now we have a Charter of Rights that expressly offers protection to the individuals or to minority groups—a charter based not on realpolitik, not on the power of the majority, but on the basis of justice to all before the law. This was the idea of "British" justice that these loyal Canadians clung to in the hope that justice would correct injustice.

Earlier, an insightful political observer wrote these words, arguing conclusively about the delusion of national motivation that fuelled democratic majorities to trample over the rights of the minorities. I quote again:

[Senator Grafstein.]

At Ottawa and in provinces other than ours, this nationalism could wear the pious mask of democracy. Because, as English-speaking Canadians became proportionately more numerous, they took to hiding their intolerance behind acts of majority rule; that was how they quashed bilingualism in the Manitoba Legislature, violated rights acquired by separate schools in various provinces, savagely imposed conscription in 1917, and broke a solemn promise in 1942.

As a footnote, this author added these explanatory words:

Andre Laurendeau has just written with great clarity an account of how, with the plebiscite of 1942, the state became the tool of Anglo-Canadian nationalism, and of how that state took advantage of French-Canadian numerical weakness to divest itself of pledges it had made (La Crise de la Conscription, Montreal, 1962). A tale even more shameful could be told of how, during the same war and with similar inspiration, the vengeful powers of the state were turned against the Japanese-Canadian minority.

These were the words written in a brilliant article entitled "New Treason of the Intellectuals," first published in 1962 in a little-known magazine called Cité Libre by a little-known law professor called Pierre Elliott Trudeau. And these words lead me back to my original argument. The infringement of basic rights should indeed be examined on a cost benefit analysis. If the Prime Minister takes Jeremy Bentham's utilitarian view, I take Immanuel Kant's view that the benefit of restitution today transcends the costs. To use Bentham, and even Mill, without Kant is like playing hockey without a puck. How the players play is just as important as the score to Canadians. Kant argued, in "Critique of Pure Reason," that rights are "natural" precisely for this reason. Kant foresaw that natural rights could not be removed without the consent—at least, the implied legitimate consent—of the citizen victim in the interests of the majority. Kant laid the groundwork for a pluralistic society that could not be tyrannized by the majority. Today we should not swallow concepts of general welfare at the expense of minority rights which fail to respect the plurality of our democracy and its distinctiveness.

John Rawls, in his book A Theory of Justice, wrote:

Each person possesses an inviolability founded on justice that even the welfare of society as a whole cannot override—the rights secured by justice not subject to political bargaining or to be the calculus are of social interests.

Now, if certain rights are inalienable—which I believe they are—can we not agree, honourable senators, that what we are really dealing with is the question of human dignity? Any destruction of human dignity not yet restored, as was done to the Canadians of Japanese descent, cannot now be fully restored. The Prime Minister and other Canadians are right—compensation now can never restore them fully. Hence, my argument that we seek partial compensation from the many in our society to the few. Cannot this act of partial restoration demonstrate a real respect for the sanctity of human dignity? Can we not agree that government has a duty to redistribute taxpayers' dollars to adjust this present grievance, this unfinished business left smouldering and moulding in open government files?

Is this not the basic philosophy behind the liberal idea of affirmative action? Why is it that secretaries and others in the federal public service still rail against seemingly unjust treatment by affirmative action that bonuses those who have French as an additional language? Is not affirmative action a method to induce affirmative equality before the law? Affirmative action is a method to increase respect for human dignity. Is not this the engine driving affirmative action for women? Does not the charter recognize the principle of affirmative action in section 15(2) as a legitimate means to pay the cost now for past injustices? This is a cost, a true cost, a fair cost that we, as individuals in society, must pay and continue to pay for injustices in the past, for compensation is a product of the past. Thus is the rationale of affirmative action for French Canadians embedded in our principles of bilingualism which I, for one, freely accept and gladly applaud.

Let us approach the concept of compensation from the point of view of the common law. Let us examine the viewpoint, as well, that it was necessary in time of war to do what was done!

The common law has always recognized the principle of compensation as a fundamental principle of restitution and equity between individuals, even in cases of necessity. It was pointed out to me by my friend, Professor Friedland, that this principle was hotly debated in our first year class at the U. of T. law school. We were taught this idea from a leading case in "Caesar" Wright's famed case book on torts. In Vincent v. Lake Erie Transportation Company, a decision of the Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1910, we were asked whether the defence of necessity could withstand a claim for compensation for damage. A wharf had been severely damaged by a ship owner keeping his vessel tied to the wharf in a storm. The ship owner alleged that, after discharging the cargo, the wind had attained such a great velocity that the master and the crew were powerless to move the vessel. Necessity was the defence. Damages were granted to the wharf owner by the ship owner. The ship owner argued that his captain and his crew had no control over the conditions which caused the damage. The court, however, found that compensation must be made.

Honourable senators, let me quote from that case:

Theologians hold that a starving man may, without moral guilt, take what is necessary to sustain life; but it could hardly be said that the obligation would not be upon such person to pay the value of the property so taken when he became able to do so. And so public necessity, in times of war or peace, may require the taking of private property for public purposes; but under our system of jurisprudence compensation must be made.

What would the common law courts have said, honourable senators, had a ship of state intentionally continued the damage after the velocity of war had disappeared for over four years? What kind of additional damages, what kind of punitive damages would have been awarded here in our case?

• (1540)

The essence of the argument at common law is the same as our present argument in favour of affirmative action. Affirmative action restores equality before the law. We are redressing past injustices at a cost to society today. Therefore what we are treating here is the very foundation of the Constitution, the very basis, the intrinsic nature of our legal system—and that is how our law treats our people. Our Constitution demands that all people be treated equally before the law. This is the cornerstone of our legal system, the cornerstone of the legitimate authority in this chamber. Here in the Senate this is no mean national ethic that holds the national idea supreme. Paramountcy of the Charter means placing people before parliamentary supremacy. Primacy of Parliament has been transplanted by sovereignty of the individual in a democratic state. British justice has been replaced by Canadian justice. To undermine now this principle is to violate the first principle of democracy, which is equality before the law. If we consider, in the deepest part of our heart, that a group of Canadians are treated unequally or unjustly on the facts here argued, not to restore them in law and dignity to their full place is to deny the very essence of the Constitution. This is a functional solution to a pragmatic problem.

Therefore, honourable senators, we are not here to debate an injustice. This we can agree upon. We are not here to moralize. We are not here to reconstruct the past. We are not here to expiate the sins of our fathers or grandfathers. We are here to give pragmatic support to the law's pragmatic principle, namely, respect for our laws and our institutions; to breathe life into the first principle of equality before the law.

Once we choose not to confront historical cases, we open up the possibility of arbitrariness in obeying the law. If, in the Senate, we refuse, when we are all satisfied that there was a grave injustice, to remonstrate with government and Parliament, are we not on the slippery side of a slope? Think of the message we are sending if we turn our backs on this transgression. Are we saying that in certain cases, for certain reasons, the government can break fundamental laws and then disavow the consequences after the event? What reason remains for individuals to feel guilty when they break the law? By what rights in a democratic society can a government distance itself from the principle of equality before the law when its constituents cannot? Just as important, how can we argue that it is prudent to do so when it is the first step down the slippery slope to arbitrary authority?

The message that we in the Senate should send out is that we cherish legal rationality as a necessary precondition to legitimate government; that no government or its successors can get away with singling out individuals or groups for unfair persecution; and that human dignity comes prior to considerations of convenience. This is not some radical argument. It is as old as the Bible itself. It asserts that cost/benefit calculations must give way to profound principles on which utilitarian considerations rest. As usual, principles and pragmatism stand side by side, and they stand best when they stand together.

I argue that this case for compensation is a practical one, that requires this government to uphold equality before the law for its citizens. With compensation, the task of politicians is to show why this case stands apart. A Committee of Parliament, representing all parties, in its report entitled Equality Now, unanimously called for an apology and compensation. If we concede that violations of basic rights or equality before the law have been made, and we do not recompense or seek to make whole those citizen's rights, have we not therefore eroded our own authority and that of the government in the eyes and minds of our citizenry? Take a step down that slippery slope, let violations or infringements of law go unanswered or unpaid, then do we not join the conspiracy that undermines both the legitimacy and the rule of law?

Can we avert our glance and say "I cannot burden my mind with acts of the past. I have to go forward. I cannot deal with the past"? Is this not itself a step to lawlessness? If we dilute the glue, which is equality before the law, we undermine the very bricks upon which our legal, parliamentary institutions, and indeed this very chamber, is constructed. What is the cost to Canadians if we do not compensate? What is the deterrent to future acts of injustice? Will it be an invitation to lawlessness if society has no memory? We are now told that Mr. Justice Ilesley in 1948 warned his cabinet colleagues: "History would denounce the party for having continued those orders"; but they were continued nonetheless; and today there is still no haste to make amends.

What kind of precedent do we establish if we approve a scheme of partial compensation? We would set a tariff barrier against future misconduct? We would endorse a precedent that reduces respect for those leaders of that day and relegates them to figures of disrepute in history—as they should be. Is this not important in itself? Do we not set a practical set of values for this generation to follow? Do we not, by our action, now suggest a different standard of national and international conduct that the Prime Minister himself has so actively pursued in his quest for peace? Do not norms of international conduct start with the treatment of individuals at home rather than the treatment of nations abroad? What would the growing Third World, composed as it is of visible majorities, make of this? Would they not applaud our courage and generosity to one of our visible minorities?

In Canada we now have an opportunity to make history by rewriting it. What will people of other nations say about this? That Canada placed restoration of human dignity before realpolitik, that Canada placed respect before pride. That human rights live in our foreign policy precisely because of our domestic policy. Justice was done and seen to be done. That racism, alive in Canada in 1941, is dead in 1984.

Racism is rooted in our minds. Hannah Arendt in her book The Origins of Totalitarianism defined extreme racism as "radical evil". She wrote:

[Senator Grafstein, .]

When the impossible was made possible, it became unpunishable, unforgivable . . . evil which could no longer be understood and explained by evil motives or self interest, greed, . . . resentment, thirst for power, and cowardice and therefore which anger could not avenge, love could not endure, friendship could not forgive . . .

The 1981 Nobel prize winner Elias Canetti in his book Crowds and Power analyzed the origins of racism by showing the actual pleasure one group gets by pronouncing an unfavourable verdict against another group in society. He said:

At the root of the process lies the urge to form hostile packs, which, in the end, leads inevitably to actual war packs. Through being applied to many different spheres the process becomes diluted, but even if this means that it operates peacefully, apparently resulting only in verbal judgments, the urge to push it to its conclusion, to the active and bloody hostility of two packs, is always there in an embryonic form.

Honourable senators, is not our task here in the Senate to be vigilant? We can stamp out this pernicious embryo of racism whenever it rears its ugly head. And we can create conditions that suffocate its growth!

And after all, is not justice defined by history and restitution? In Deuteronomy XVIII, 20 we are told "Justice, justice shall you follow". One interpretation given for the repetition of the word justice is that justice means justice both in goals and ends. The Hebrew word for "justice" is the same as the word for "giving" and "victory". Giving is a duty that precedes a right or a privilege. "Giving" in this biblical sense is deemed necessary to correct injustice. Only by an act of "giving" can we start a fresh clean page in history. Only in "giving" do we get "victory."

The Bible is instructive on the laws governing the governors. In 2 Samuel VII, 7 we are told that when the prophet Nathan asked King David what is proper compensation when a rich and powerful man takes a poor man's only precious possession, King David, infuriated, responded that the poor man should be compensated four times over. Nathan then told King David he was the culprit because he had abused his powers as king for personal reasons. David immediately acknowledged his error thereby concurring in the concept of compensation. Maimonides, the twelfth century philosopher, explained this passage and the words used by saying that if a king discriminates against his subjects, this is not law, this is robbery. We are also told by other teachers that King David by publicly acknowledging guilt and restitution allowed his kingdom to flourish while King Saul, who under similar circumstances refused to publicly apologize for errors of government, saw his kingdom, his legacy and his dynasty quickly disappear.

Hence, I argue, honourable senators, that our responsibility here is clear to ourselves, the government and this institution of Parliament we have sworn to uphold. Pay today. Calculate a fair formula for these living Canadians—perhaps an annuity. Pay we must. Pay we should! We are told that the Japanese community is divided on this question. Some demand an apology and compensation; others think an apology will suffice. Still others wish to forget the whole painful episode. However, this is not a question for that small minority of Canadian citizens of Japanese origin who were injured to remonstrate—this is a question for the majority of Canadians to answer.

For those who have argued against the entrenchment of the Charter of Rights in our Constitution, the American experience during the same World War II period is instructive. While Japanese were incarcerated and dispersed, their property was not taken and measures were terminated in 1944. In the interim, as American citizens, they were allowed into active service and they volunteered in great numbers serving with great distinction, as honourable senators know. Their government was restrained by their constitution. Now a commission of Congress has reviewed this history thereby reopening the question of compensation in America. In Seattle, Washington just last week, on April 27, the Seattle School Board authorized $5,000 reparation payments to each of 27 Japanese-American clerks forced to resign after Japan's attack on Pearl Harbour. Honourable senators, it is still not too late to change history.

I would like to leave with honourable senators three ideas—three thoughts to galvanize your support. First, this injury to our citizens was different and unique. Second, pragmatism dictates that by fostering respect for human dignity we gain respect for the Senate and ourselves. Third, good old Canadian common sense knows it is never too late to correct a wrong. Canadians believe in affirmative action!

For me, honourable senators, the question of reform of the Senate is tied up in this issue. My reading of voluminous comments made about Senate reform in the last decade shows me an almost total preoccupation by critics with the "ethics of process"—John Stuart Mill's idea that the method of the appointment of representatives is a key element, a precondition, to the actual acceptance of a democratic institution. To address this question is for another time and, perhaps, for other voices.

In the interim, by the passage of the Charter, has not the Senate in fact been reformed? Has not the Senate been reborn again and given a new mandate by the repatriation of the Constitution and the entrenchment of the Charter of Rights? Has not this vital new fact been virtually unnoticed and unheralded? If we have been granted a new role then this is a chance for us to prove it.

As for calls for more regional representation, I simply do not understand the call for greater regionalism in the Senate unless it is in terms of seeking to reduce inequalities between regions and reduce inequalities between groups as best we can. One wonders whether representatives of the region necessarily are the best spokesmen for injustices against minorities within a region. However, that argument is also for another day.

In closing, let me repeat my belief that there is a new, exciting and paramount role for this chamber. That is to say, we act as a surety—a protector of rights for those groups in society which require affirmative action, those groups which require the long and strong equal arm of the law. In this imperfect world, as best we can, we must endeavour to build a platform equally open to all upon which Canadians of whatever origin, colour, race, gender or disability can be launched into a Canadian society of growing and equal opportunities. On this platform all of us in this chamber now proudly stand. Is it not our turn to bend and help the rest of Canada to stand with us? Can we not hammer two strong planks in that platform by apology and compensation to finally close the compelling case of Canadians of Japanese origin?

We have heard in recent days much about the need to redress structural deficits in our economy and move towards balancing our budget. In this way, so we are told, future generations will not be burdened with increasing costs of today so our economy can continue to grow. Equally, honourable senators, our conscience demands we redress this government—created deficit of human dignity so that we can finally balance our books of justice—so that we can free our conscience and allow our spirit to flourish and grow. We were not brought here to dilute the quality of justice. Let us give a new definition to Canadian justice.

Respectfully, honourable senators, I request your support for this motion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Thursday, May 3, 1984

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

(Statutory Instruments No. 23)

In accordance with its permanent reference, Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Joint Committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Regulations, C.R.C. c. 875.

The Regulations under Report deal solely with the importation of fruits and vegetables of a kind grown in Canada. Subject to two minor exceptions, they provide that no person shall import such fruits and vegetables unless the importer purchased the produce "not later than 24 hours, excluding Sundays and legal holidays, after time of shipment from the point of production". Your Committee initially took the view that the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-31, does not grant authority for the enactment of a regulatory scheme designed to restrict the importation of fruit and vegetables and, by letter dated February 14, 1983, the Designated Instruments Officer for the Department of Agriculture informed the Committee that "these Regulations are in the opinion of departmental legal counsel ultra vires" the Act. Your Committee was further informed that it was the intention of the Department to seek the repeal of the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act and Regulations.

Your Committee subsequently sought an assurance that pending their formal revocation, the Regulations would not be enforced by customs officers. The Designated Instruments Officer, in a letter received on June 30, 1983, indicated that the Department wished to continue to apply the Regulations in order to obtain accurate information as to their operation and effectiveness.

After consideration of this reply, your Committee instructed its Joint Chairmen and Vice-Chairman to write to the Minister of Agriculture to ask for his personal assurance that customs officers would be requested to cease applying the Regulations to imports of fresh fruit and vegetables. In their letter, the Chairmen recorded the Committee's belief that it is "highly improper for officers of the Government of Canada to persist in enforcing Regulations which they admit to be ultra vires the enabling Statute" and commented that "these Regulations purport to impose severe restrictions on importers of fresh fruit and vegetables and, in our view, the need to obtain additional information as to the usefulness of these restrictions can not justify the continued application of illegal import requirements." On January 31, 1984, the Minister of Agriculture replied that "it has become clearly evident through our consultations that should these Regulations be revoked the Canadian produce industry would be seriously jeopardized". On this basis, the Minister proposed "to postpone action on these Regulations pending an amendment to the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act, which will empower similar regulations under that Act" and stated that "such an amendment is currently being introduced through normal legal channels".

Your Committee, while it notes the undertaking to seek appropriate legislative authority for regulations of this kind, is firmly of the view that the continued application of these Regulations at the present time involves an inadmissible departure from the usages of Parliamentary government and a repudiation of the concept of the Rule of Law which is at the heart of our constitutional order. While your Committee recognizes that the revocation of these import restrictions may result in an economic disadvantage for domestic producers of fruit and vegetables, it does not accept that this justifies the Executive in illegally restricting the liberty of trade and commerce of Canadian importers. To do so would be to accept that ours is a government of men and not of laws.

For the Executive to persist in enforcing Regulations which it acknowledges to be unauthorized by law strikes your Committee as wrong and completely unacceptable. That such a course of action should have the support of a Minister of the Crown is a matter of even greater concern to your Committee.

Pending the adoption of appropriate legislation by Parliament, your Committee recommends that immediate steps be taken to ensure that customs officers charged with their enforcement cease to apply these illegal Regulations to imports of fresh fruit and vegetables.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY,
Joint Chairman.

ADDRESS

OF

HIS EXCELLENCY MIGUEL DE LA MADRID
PRESIDENT OF MEXICO

TO

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

IN THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

ON

TUESDAY, MAY 8, 1984

The President was welcomed by the Right Honourable P. E. Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Maurice Riel, Speaker of the Senate, and the Honourable Lloyd Francis, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Lloyd Francis (Speaker of the House of Commons): Order, please. The Right Hon. the Prime Minister of Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Señor Presidente, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Hon. Members of the Senate and of the House of Commons.

Canadians consider it a mark of special distinction for them, Sir, that you have chosen Canada for your first official visit North of the Rio Grande. We welcome you with open hearts to our country, as Mexicans have warmly welcomed Canadians. The generosity of your people is matched by the splendour of your country, as in the words of Octavio Paz:

[Translation]

Mexico rises between two seas as an enormous pyramid: its four sides are the four cardinal points, its steps are the climates of all its regions, its high plateau is the house of the sun and the constellations.

[English]

Mr. President, Canada is honoured by your presence in this Chamber. All Canadians are pleased to welcome you to Canada and to afford you an opportunity to speak directly to us at this Special Session of both Houses of our Parliament.

Early in your term of office, Sir, you earned our admiration and respect for the vigour and determination with which you strove to ease the crushing burden of indebtedness which Mexico, like so many other countries around the world, faced during the deep recession of recent times. Courageously you made difficult decisions which required heavy sacrifices by the Mexican people.

You have proved, as you said you would, that both the people and Government of Mexico are vigorous and mature, capable of responding to crisis and overcoming adversity. We admire such strong and determined political will. I am glad that Canada and Canadian financial institutions were able to play a part in assisting you.

Thus I welcome you as a neighbour and good friend. Mexico and Canada are no longer separated by time and space, living apart in their own labyrinths of solitude, to borrow again from the moving thoughts of Octavio Paz. In dramatic ways, technologies of transportation and communications make it possible now for nations everywhere to draw together. Government leaders in our two countries, and increasingly people in private walks of life, have shown very clearly their strong desire to draw together, to know each other, to co-operate in the arts, science, technology, energy and commerce.

Your visit today is contributing to this growing tradition of community and consultation for we have much in common and much to say to one another. When I became Prime Minister in 1968, the Government decided that Canada must systematically enlarge its relationships with Mexico and other key countries of Latin America. This we have done, with a reciprocal commitment from the Mexican Government. I have had the pleasure of making two official visits to Mexico and of welcoming two of your predecessors to Canada. These visits and the frequent meetings between our Ministers attest to our mutual determination to make our bilateral relationship successful.

[Translation]

Mr. President, the links between Canada and Mexico go back for many centuries. In fact, Samuel De Champlain visited a flourishing settlement in Mexico City, nine years before he founded Quebec City and fourteen years before travelling past the site of Ottawa, where we are today, during an expedition on the Ottawa River.

Canadians will recall with pride the constant collaboration with Mexico within United Nations agencies and other institutions during the creative post-war years. At the time, we worked together to prepare for a world order to be founded on a common vision of the need gradually to reinforce international law and to establish effective economic co-operation. In a word, we tried to provide a solid basis for peace.

Unfortunately, since then, man has seemed to take a perverse pleasure in developing military technology, while political institutions designed to safeguard peace crumbled.

As international tensions rose, Canada and Mexico, conscious of their responsibility and of their own resources, have always tried, each in their own way, to persuade the parties concerned to reconcile their differences. The perseverance we have shown in the past is needed even more urgently today, because the dangers that threaten us now are so much greater.

As you know, Mr. President, Canada has, out of a concern for deteriorating relationships between East and West, taken the initiative to try and bring these essential relationships on a more constructive level. On that occasion, I found that both sides had a number of points in common, and I urged heads of State in East and West to set aside their differences and concentrate on what draws them together. In fact, we all have the right, in fact we have a duty, to try and reduce the risk of nuclear war.

[English]

Mexico and Mexicans have earned international credentials for independent viewpoint, fair mindedness and common sense. That is why I am encouraged that Mexico is currently spokesman for the Group of 77. You no doubt regret, as I do, Mr. President, the present state of North-South dialogue after the strenuous efforts Mexico and Canada made in recent years, especially in Cancun, to stimulate progress. We hope that Mexico's moderation and restraint will help to move the dialogue back on to a constructive path. Success in that endeavour would serve the cause of peace in a very fundamental way.

In the same spirit, I congratulate Mexico and the other Contadora members for their imagination and courage in seeking a regional solution to the potentially explosive situation in Central America. Your approach to this web of most difficult problems is above all realistic in its aim of building a consensus on a set of socio-political security objectives for Central America.

As a consensus develops, Canada will be prepared to help with whatever political or economic support we can effectively offer. We are consulting closely with the three Contadora working commissions. We will also be in close touch with the Action Committee for Socio-Economic Development—CADESCA.

Canada's approach to these problems, as frequently enunciated in Canada and in the region by my colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs, is to recognize that the basic causes of instability and conflict are economic and social in nature. We look to Governments in the region for advice on how enduring solutions are most likely to come about. We are firmly persuaded that these are problems which must be seen, as they will be solved, in the light of the human needs of the people directly affected, and not in terms of ideological arguments. The imposition by force of external ideologies is seldom motivated by a genuine concern for the needs of the people.

Amid the international tensions and violence of our times, the right to speak becomes a responsibility, the need to hear a duty. That is why we are gathered in this Chamber today to listen to your views firsthand.

Each of our political parties, in its own way, is apprehensive about the dangerous deterioration in the security situation in the neighbouring regions that you know so well. Therefore be assured, Mr. President, that you are now welcomed eagerly by an audience, both here and in Canada at large, who will be heeding your words of counsel with an open mind and sympathetic heart.

[Translation]

To speak clearly, to dialogue, and to work together in the quest for viable solutions marked by human values and common sense—these are the urgent tasks of our area. The entire world today is trapped in a prison of dilemma, mainly dominated by the nuclear threat, and yet no less dominated by the tyranny of false and outdated ideologies on how society should evolve. As nations, we all search for the way out of such a prison, while remaining faithful to our own traditions and giving loose rein to our hopes and dreams in order to enjoy the fruits of the amazing human mind. I firmly believe that humanity will find its way; it has no other option.

It is with great pleasure that we welcome today the President of Mexico, Mr. Miguel de la Madrid Hurtado.

[Translation]

Señor Miguel de la Madrid (President of the United Mexican States): Mr. Speaker, distinguished Members of the Canadian Parliament, Mr. Prime Minister, Ladies and Gentlemen.

It is a great honour to accept the invitation extended to me by this distinguished body which represents the people of Canada. The Canadian Parliament combines the quest for the democratic perfection of the nation and the desire for its people's active participation in the tasks of the State. This forum confirms the validity of the desires and hopes with which the Founding Fathers of this country viewed its future.

Canada has forged its history and its future in a continuing effort to build a system of life that is firmly sustained by values and principles. The vigour of its political institutions and relations of peaceful coexistence stem from its perseverance in the practice of democracy as their mainstay.

Constitutional balances and counterbalances, the fostering of representative assembly, respect for social diversity and the opinions of the citizenry, and the active support of one's chosen party are constants in public power based on a broad and firm community foundation.

No democratic State can stand on the fragmentation of its society. On the contrary, political legitimacy must be based on the sentiments of the nation, on the co-ordination of action and needs of different sectors and groups; on maintaining a balance between the social distribution of responsibilities and the scope of governmental powers.

In putting its authentic values into practice, each country manifests its unique nature. Canada and Mexico are the result of unique and untransferable experiences. Their histories make it impossible in our times for them to accept any devious attempt to imposition or forced assimilation of foreign systems.

We do not, however, believe in the Utopia of an autarchic system and we assert our identity without closing ourselves off from enriching contacts with other peoples. We want to join in united efforts, but we refuse to accept any attempt at uniformity that denies the historical foundation of peoples and cultures, that harms the individual values of each society and closes off genuine channels of co-operation and solidarity.

Canada and Mexico are becoming increasingly associated with each other through initiatives and common viewpoints and through their responsible participation in international affairs. Today there is particularly strong need to make our continent a place of converging ideals and an area privileged with understanding and progress, and to establish new relations that are more dynamic, more productive and more just.

This is so because the international community is immersed today in increasing uncertainty in the face of power politics, hegemonic zeal, political intolerance and profound economic imbalances that are so harmful to developing countries.

The world would seem to be skidding down the slope devised by the promoters of force. Technological development has relentlessly built up a deposit of destruction and terror. Both usable weapons and the leftovers of war are employed in attacks on the survival and dignity of mankind. While innumerable people are afflicted by hunger, unhealthy conditions, ignorance and death, millions are being spent to build an apocalyptic arsenal that is becoming increasingly difficult to control and presents a great risk of thoughtless use. We are witnessing an irrational cult to the capacity for self-destruction and to excessive spending to build up force.

Mexico has categorically repudiated the validity of doctrines of deterrence and nuclear balance which have jeopardized the legitimate aspirations of nations to live in peace, to seek economic development, political stability and social progress through just and equitable co-operation.

It is imperative that measures be taken to prevent the destruction of all that represents the cumulative efforts of modern civilization. The aberrational idea that not acting is equivalent to avoiding risk must be abandoned. Eluding responsibilities multiplies the effect of lack of foresight and, sooner or later, the price of remaining passive must be paid.

In this context, Mexico has followed with particular interest the development of the peace initiatives recently undertaken by Prime Minister Trudeau, which led to his interviews with leaders of the superpowers and with those of other countries that possess nuclear weapons and of numerous industrialized and developing nations. We congratulate this outstanding contemporary statesman who, with his political imagination, courage and capacity for leadership, has successfully furthered the cause of peace and development.

Mexico fully supports all action aimed at halting the arms race and reaffirms its commitment to complete and universal disarmament and to dialogue and negotiation as vehicles of understanding.

We do not want a return to the dark days in which the alternative to confrontation was an unstable peace, subject to cycles of dependence on armamentism. On the contrary, we want constructive times of stability and progress through co-operation. The crisis that is now shaking the very foundations of world order makes this an ideal time to re-examine our course and adjust our objectives. The current problems affect us all and also tend, although in varying degree, to increase for us all. In looking toward the future, each country must decide whether it will act in favour of a collective effort or to pursue sterile and egotistical interests in isolation.

Two indivisible imperatives weigh on mankind's aspirations, peace and development. We recognize, with concern, that the instruments for achieving them are becoming more and more fragile. In addition to political tensions, we are faced with economic uncertainty, breakdowns in negotiation and the outright obsolescence of models and systems that have not provided the answers required today. Once again, the burdens of the crisis and of adjustments are being transferred to the developing countries and the lack of equity in the international structure is becoming more serious.

It is not enough to recognize that interdependence has only exceptionally led to the level of understanding and co-operation required. It is also necessary to prevent the lack of dialogue between the North and the South on behalf of world economic recovery from becoming part of the vicious circle of confrontation between hegemonic powers, or of irreducible opposition between East and West based on unilateral and ideologically motivated views, that violates sovereignties and delays or cancels out any real hope of independent progress.

The economic crisis is making inequality more acute, increasing contradictions and undermining the foundations of the international order. Recession and generalized inflation, the constriction in trade and the reappearance of protectionism, monetary and financial chaos, and the foreign debt are all manifestations of a divided world, incapable of achieving cohesion and rationality.

Sustained recovery will not be possible if it does not extend to every member of the international community.

The crisis that is affecting the developing world will not be settled without the concerted action of the international community. The problem of the debt is of a global nature. It affects all of us, and we should all contribute to solving it: industrialized and developing countries, debtors and creditors, and public and private financing institutions. To meet their loan payments, debtor countries need to regenerate their capacity to pay, and that will only be possible if their export products have access to the markets of the industrialized countries. At the same time, such access is the only possibility for strengthening their purchasing power abroad and re-establishing world trade flows. Attempts to do otherwise are not only unfair but also unrealistic. We trust that this point will be fully understood.

If the protectionism of the industrialized countries does not give way to the logic of reality, meeting demands for generating foreign exchange to cover development needs will prove an extremely complex task. Eventually an illogical situation would arise that would lead to undesirable forms of involution as a substitute for progress.

Regaining confidence and the course of progress implies immediately strengthening the specific mechanisms and activities of co-operation among States. This would be a return to the primary and definitive meaning of interdependence.

For both Mexico and Canada, the continental scope of such co-operation is fundamental. Imbalances in the world economy have dealt serious blows to the countries of Latin America. Long decades of growth and growing expectations have been replaced by regressive forms of development that affect not only aspirations for progress, but also employment, consumption and the well-being of extensive groups of the population.

It is thus imperative to establish new continental relations that provide room for production, exports, the distribution of income and the political and social progress of all peoples. It is a question of expanding economic co-operation, and with it, development and stability; of broadening political communication with respect for plurality and, with it, the true security of all nations.

Latin America has revitalized its own endeavours. We have co-ordinated actions under a joint strategy aimed at renovating our approaches, criteria and mechanisms. Our goal is to bring about a system of collective economic security supported by regional integration, the strengthening of our forums and organizations, and the co-ordination of common stands. This is the meaning and the objectives of the Quito Declaration.

To supplement these actions, we Latin American countries have responsibly begun making adjustments in our economies—in a necessary effort to rationalize them—that have a painful social impact.

In Mexico's case, we have organized with determination to overcome the obstacles arising from adverse circumstances. Firmly united, the Mexican people have brought their combined sacrifice, work and trust to bear on the common task of reordering the economy. The national Development Plan we have drawn up is designed to respond to the most pressing immediate problems, such as inflation and the fiscal and foreign economic imbalance. At the same time, the Plan involves a readjustment process to make the structural changes essential to improving the production base by guiding it realistically towards feasible priority areas of national development. Despite the great difficulties that Mexico has faced, we have maintained a reasonable level of spending and social investment with a view to fulfilling the binding commitments inherent in the history of our nation's development and to alleviating the suffering of the population.

Distinguished Members of Parliament, Canada has been outstanding among the countries of the industrialized world in its sensitive understanding of international realities and its commitment to dialogue, development and detente.

We have observed its growing interest in Latin America and, particularly, the attention it has been directing toward the Central American crisis. That interest has been effectively demonstrated by this Parliament with satisfaction. The establishment in 1981 of the Subcommittee to study Canada's relations with Latin America and the Caribbean is indicative of its desire to strengthen ties between our countries. Another outstanding example is Canada's decision to double, over a five-year period, the economic assistance it provides to Latin American and Caribbean countries.

Mexico and Canada agree that the major cause of the Central American crisis is the area's lack of economic and social progress. This is why Canada's contribution to the program of the Committee for the Support of Central American Economic and Social Development, created under the auspices of SELA (Latin American Economic System) is so important. Canada's experience in designing and implementing development projects, together with its financial and technological capacity, will unquestionably prove very useful.

Canada's commitment to stability in the region is also reflected in the support the Canadian Government has expressed in different forums for the peacemaking efforts of the Contadora Group. Today, with threats to peace in the region expanding, the voice of Canada and its political and moral weight are particularly valuable.

Today, we are reiterating our conviction, that the only path to firm and lasting peace is full respect for law and for the principles and norms of peaceful international coexistence.

It is the unavoidable obligation of Central Americans to staunch their wounds and regain stability, revitalizing the age-old concept of unity and settling differences among brothers, while it is the duty of other countries to respect the free determination of these peoples and to abstain from the use or promotion of force as a means of solution. Fortunately, countries like Canada, and almost all the Latin American nations, have taken specific steps to demonstrate their full support for diplomatic negotiations. This build-up of the international desire for peace strengthens the possibility that law and reason will ultimately triumph over generalized violence and war.

Distinguished Members of Parliament, in today's world, characterized by East-West tension—a sterile force that endangers the very existence of mankind—and marked by the profound imbalance between the North and South and the consequent instability owing to injustice and inequality, Mexico and Canada share the common goal of promoting dialogue, reducing tensions and furthering international co-operation for development.

In practice, Canada's and Mexico's foreign policy, as expressed in different forums, has often been the same and they have both promoted initiatives and striven for solutions to the serious problems that afflict mankind. This is not unusual. We have both always upheld the importance of international organizations for the maintenance of peace, security and co-operation, in the conviction that such organizations represent the values of peaceful coexistence among States and the supremacy of law over force.

I have come to Canada to reaffirm the high priority the Mexican Government confers on its relations with this country. We know that distortions in the world economy, which are also affecting Mexico and Canada, have slowed the pace of our exchange activities. Nevertheless, experience in recent years has shown the numerous opportunities for co-operation in such diverse areas as agriculture, industry, energy, communications, fishing and transportation.

Economic and political relations between our two countries are not a matter of momentary circumstance, but of interests of a much vaster scope: similarity of political concepts and values, complementary economies and a common willingness to foster dialogue and co-operation on the basis of respect, trust, friendship and mutual benefit. We Mexicans and Canadians want to be increasingly closer friends.

Ladies and Gentlemen, under the threat of grave nuclear escalation, the increasingly acute ideological confrontation and the economic crisis that overshadows the world's atmosphere, there is a ray of light for the peoples of the American continent. Peace, respect for law, justice and co-operation must and will take their proper place as indispensable ideals of our community of countries. Those values are not negotiable, nor can they be fragmented without injuring the stability of all and violating the humanistic sentiment that conceived the enterprise of civilizing the New World.

It is my hope that through the untiring efforts of people and government, of organizations and individuals, future generations on our continent may find a safe, harmonious and just place in which to live together and grow. I trust that Canada and Mexico will be able to meet the challenge of making this project, which today exists in our imagination, a reality.

Thank you very much.

Hon. Maurice Riel (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. President of Mexico, Mr. Prime Minister of Canada, fellow parliamentarians.

Today we have had the great privilege of listening to an eminent statesman in the person of the President of Mexico. It is a great honour for me, as Speaker of the Senate and on behalf of my fellow senators, to thank the President for his wise words and to salute him as the leader of a country with which we maintain numerous cultural ties and ties of friendship, in addition to important trade relations.

Mr. President, you are also particularly welcome as the leader of a nation with which we share the larger part of the North American continent.

[English]

We in Canada have been impressed by the skill and the strength with which you, Mr. President, accepted the challenge of these difficult circumstances and have put your nation on the long and arduous path to recovery. In this, Mexico has given us all a praiseworthy example of confidence in the future.

A concern for the future has been evident too, Mr. President, in your commitment to the peace and well-being of the peoples of your region. We in this Parliament, indeed in this country, have followed the efforts of the Contadora Group with an intense interest and a profoundly-felt hope for their success. We realize that, as never before, we are all, literally and figuratively, "a piece of the continent, a part of the main". We ask you today to take back to your colleagues in Venezuela, Panama and Colombia our earnest wishes for the realization of your vision of a Central America in which conditions will permit its peoples to progress towards peace, stability and good neighbourliness.

[Translation]

Mr. President, we are all delighted to have you and your ministers visit Canada. Frequent meetings at the highest level, among heads of State, ensure an abiding respect for the best interests of all concerned by consolidating bilateral ties between countries. Therefore, we earnestly hope that the ties that exist between Canada and Mexico will continue to grow for the greater good of both our countries.

Finally, I wish to thank you again, Mr. President, not only for your address, not only for having come to Canada, but also for your efforts to restore peace in our hemisphere. Rest assured that Canadians, like all people of good will, are grateful to you for this and urge you to continue. In this as in all other things, Mr. President, we wish you the best of luck!

Hon. Lloyd Francis (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. President of Mexico, Mr. Prime Minister, Members of the Senate and the House of Commons.

It is a great honour for me, on behalf of Members of our Houses of Parliament and guests assembled, to express our appreciation of the Address we have heard from the President of Mexico. We welcome him to Canada as the leader of a friendly nation which shares Canada's commitment to peace and development in the Americas.

[Translation]

Continuing with the warm friendship developed between our two countries, we have the honour of welcoming our distinguished visitor to our capital.

[English]

Canada and Mexico have enjoyed diplomatic relations for 40 years. Our two nations are linked by many important treaties and agreements in such areas of common interest as energy, culture, industry and agriculture. The past several years in particular have witnessed a very welcome increase in the number and level of official contacts between our Governments.

[Translation]

In 1983, a delegation of Canadian parliamentarians visited Mexico to consolidate our friendship, increase our knowledge of each other's country and explore further avenues for co-operation between our two countries. All delegates came back delighted with their visit.

[English]

Hundreds of thousands of Canadians visit Mexico every year, and the number of Mexican visitors to Canada continues to increase. The beautiful Spanish language is heard spoken more and more often in the corridors of this building as touring groups follow guides across Parliament Hill. Such exchanges foster better mutual understanding and good will. We hope that they will thrive and expand.

[Translation]

Mindful of the cordial relationship between our two countries, we wish to thank His Excellency for his visit and his kind words. Thank you.

This joint meeting of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada is now adjourned.

THE SENATE

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

REPORTS OF COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES AND EVIDENCE ADDUCED BY FORMER SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—REFERRED TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That all reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages and the evidence adduced by the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages in the present Parliament be deemed to have been referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

If leave were granted, honourable senators, I would give a brief explanation.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators may have noticed that such a provision was part of the message which we received yesterday from the other place. I have discussed with Senator Flynn the possibility of having the same provision for such a reference of reports, etc. in our records. Therefore, it is for the sake of consistency that we have provided it.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board if he can give this chamber some information as to the intentions of the government with respect to the Western Grain Stabilization Act.

The other day the minister and his colleague gave notice that the act would be amended in the near future in order to improve its usefulness to prairie farmers. Can the minister tell us when this bill will be introduced?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): The most recent information I have, although it has not been confirmed, is that it is likely to be introduced in the other place this week. I am not 100 per cent certain whether that introduction is dependent upon some negotiation. My understanding is that the bill will be given first reading this week, but I cannot say that categorically.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend undertake to find out exactly when it will be introduced because, unless this money is forthcoming to the farming community in the near future, it will exacerbate the cost price squeeze under which it is labouring at the present time.

If the press report I have read is correct, the passage of this bill will mean a $5,000-per-farmer payment, which is a pretty substantial amount when it comes to paying for fuel for seeding this spring.

I should like to know from the minister exactly when the bill will come into effect. He tells me he does not know that, but perhaps he can find out. At the same time, I should like to know his program as to when this will actually come into force and when we may expect to see the funds disbursed.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I will try to answer those questions. Earlier, I understood Senator Roblin to be asking something about the provisions of the act. If he did not do so, I suppose that I do not want to bring them up now. If he is interested in the intended changes, however, I would be happy to go over them.

The proposed amendments are far reaching. In my experience it is the first time that the actual legislation to be introduced will exceed, in the amount of portable pay-out, the requests that were made by opposition members, particularly by way of a resolution passed by the Agriculture Committee of the House of Commons. The expense period for which a payment will be paid out is 1983. The statistics will be based on the income tax returns of 10,000 grain producers. An analysis of such returns could not be made until after the income tax returns were submitted at the end of April. I am informed that it will take about eight months into this calendar year before those expense calculations can be made. They are not projections, they are actual expenses experienced.

The proposal is to change the contributory period from a calendar year to a crop year in order to make the calculation more sensitive. Obviously, we are now into the crop year 1983-84. The payments will all be in by July 31. After that date, the calculations will be made as to income.

It is estimated that the earliest that those two sets of calculations can be made and can result in cheques being put in the mail will be towards the end of October or early November. If conditions do not change—and conditions are always changing—it is forecast that the total payment will be in excess of $300 million. If there should be a much larger quantity of grain marketed by July 31 than is anticipated, the total will be less than that amount. If conditions were much worse than is being anticipated and if less grain were marketed this crop year, the payment would be more. Based on these kinds of calculations, it is estimated that the maximum payment per producer will be between $5,000 and $6,000.

Honourable senators, it is the intention of the government to table the legislation. The government has been seeking—successfully, I believe—the co-operation of the opposition parties so that the bill can be passed quickly. It is the government's wish that the bill become law as quickly as possible. These calculations will then be made and the payment, according to the proposed legislation, can be made as early as October or November.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not want to assist the minister in converting this discussion into a debate, but of course the critical factor here is the new trigger formula. It is not really described in any detailed fashion in the information given. I do not, however, ask the minister to give us that sort of detail now. If the bill is coming down this week or next, I am content to wait for it.

Senator Argue: It is a new trigger formula and everybody on the advisory committee supports it.

PARLIAMENT HILL

LANDSCAPING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions asked yesterday by Senators Macquarrie, Godfrey, Guay, Riley, Murray and Molson concerning the beautification program presently under way on Parliament Hill.

The beautification program on Parliament Hill is a National Capital Commission project which has been under consideration for a couple of years. The project was authorized by cabinet, and both Speakers were consulted before and after the decision was made. Additionally, the Minister of Public Works, who is responsible for the project, notified party leaders in the other place before the work was undertaken.

There are several reasons for this project. First, the wall around the flower beds and shrubbery was in dangerous condition and needed to be repaired. Secondly, the bushes needed to be cut back and many of the trees were diseased. It was thought that it would be easier to do everything at once rather than in bits and pieces. Thirdly, the landscaping is being restored to its appearance in the 1920s, just after the present Centre Block was built after the fire. Fourthly, cables had to be installed underground for the Son et Lumière Show. It was thought that it would be preferable to bury the cables under the shrubs and flowers that had to be dug up anyway rather than to tear up the front lawn.

The Son et Lumière Show will be an historical recreation of the story of Canada from its discovery until just after the Second World War. The show will begin on June 22 and I understand that all members of Parliament and senators will be invited to the first show. There will be a set of portable bleachers rolled on to the lawn each evening before the show and removed immediately afterwards.

The government believes that it will be of benefit to Canadians and other visitors and will add to their knowledge about Canada.

The total cost of the project is $2.3 million which the government considers to be money wisely spent. In fact, doing these two or three jobs in a co-ordinated way will actually save money.

The work is due to be completed on June 15, when all of the trees, flowers and shrubbery will be back in place. None of this will affect the changing of the guard ceremony.

In response to a specific question from Senator Guay, I am informed that security considerations had nothing to do with the beautification project; and, in direct response to Senator Godfrey's question, there are no plans at the present time to plant trees on the east side of the building.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I regret that I cannot share the applause given to the answer, although I thank the minister for having brought it to the Senate so promptly.

May I ask him whether he has an answer to my more general question as to the attitude of the government to the status of the Parliament buildings; whether in the view of the government the Parliament buildings are in the same category as any post office or other federal building and therefore to be altered or dealt with at the sole discretion of the government; or whether the government is not obliged to consult with both chambers of Parliament before undertaking works or alterations to the buildings or elsewhere on Parliament Hill?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as to whether the honourable senator is seeking facts or opinions, I believe the term he used was "attitude". It will therefore take me a little more time to ask someone to prepare that, because obviously if it is an opinion—and I am sure he agrees that it is, or at least an interpretation—it will take a little longer to prepare, particularly in the terms he has put forward related to that attitude. If the honourable senator had listened carefully to my reply, he would know that the Speakers of both houses were consulted prior to the action taken by the Department of Public Works and the National Capital Commission, who are directly responsible for carrying out the work that is going on.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, in answering the question, the Leader of the Government has chosen to ignore the fact that I also asked questions with respect to the same matter. He may feel that my questions have already been answered.

Senator Olson: That's right.

Senator Donahoe: I do not so consider, and I wish that to be clearly understood. The answer, If one were given, was that it was a decision not of the government but of Parliament as to the extent to which persons with views adverse to some government policy would be permitted to demonstrate. It was indicated that it was not the government that made the decision to permit the peace camp to remain, but Parliament.

I merely wish to point out to the Leader of the Government that we sit in the Senate and we are a functional portion of Parliament. But at no time were we asked for our opinion on the peace camp or whether permission could be granted to the persons supporting it. Therefore, I say that the answer was not an answer in that the government must have made the decision because Parliament did not. I will repeat the question: What is the attitude of the government toward the peace camp when these undertakings, the Son et Lumière and other so-called improvements are completed?

● (1410)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Donahoe is correct in that I did reply to the question yesterday. It is my sincere hope that members of the opposition will be satisfied with the answers that I give them but I cannot give an undertaking that they will be satisfied with each answer. Members of the opposition are entitled to a reply but whether or not their interpretation of it is that it is satisfactory or otherwise is entirely at their discretion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We will take that as an admission anyway.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I indicated to the minister yesterday that I did not like to engage in questioning unless I had some information. I am sorry I missed the first part of his answer because, for once in my life, I was late getting to a sitting of the Senate, having people in my office complaining about the desecration of Parliament Hill and thinking that, as a courtesy, I should listen to them. I am convinced, as an amateur silviculturist and having examined those trees, that a great many of them were healthy, lovely trees. It may be fine for the Minister of Public Works to say that some of them were diseased but it seems to me that the hale, healthy and ill went down in one vast stroke on that sad day. I shall read carefully what the minister has said and I reserve my right to question further on that which I think has done us no good and is not something over which any minister may be proud.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ALLOWANCES AND DISABILITY PENSION RECIPIENTS LIVING OUTSIDE CANADA

Question No. 4 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. With respect to (i) Canadian War Veterans who are recipients of War Disability Pensions and (ii) Canadian War Veterans Allowances or Civilian War Allowances, how many live outside Canada and what is the breakdown by country?

2. How many applications have been received by the Department of Veterans Affairs for War Veterans Allowances during the past year and how many (i) were willing or able to return to Canada to fulfill the 365 day residency requirement and (ii) had to refuse to return to Canada as a result of illness?

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT

BILL C-205, TO CHANGE THE NAME OF THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF HULL—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Leblanc, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marsden, for the second reading of Bill C-205, intituled, "An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Hull".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am pleased to see we have with us Senator Lafond, who shares my views on this kind of bill. Like me, he has always been opposed to using multiple names to indicate a riding. I imagine he will have some comments to make, and I am sure we will listen to those comments with great interest.

My only other point is that the Government has used this kind of legislation to appoint a new returning officer, using the excuse that when the name of a riding is changed the returning officer must be replaced as well.

I know this happened in the case of Ste-Hyacinthe, when they changed the name to Ste-Hyacinthe-Bagot. The returning officer was replaced because it was no longer the same riding.

The Federal Court said: No, you may not do this. The Government appealed and the case is now before the Appeals Division of the Federal Court.

I would like to know whether the Government, in the case that concerns us now, intends to replace the returning officer of the riding of Hull, if we agree that from now on, the riding will be known as Hull-Aylmer instead of just Hull.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I am sorry I was not in the House yesterday when this Bill was introduced. In fact, I was chairing the Committee on National Defence in Winnipeg. I want to thank Senator Flynn for being so kind as to adjourn debate on the Bill, to give me a chance to resolve what may seem to be a conflict of interest.

I have no objection to the name of the riding being changed to Hull-Aylmer, provided the procedure is acceptable. The riding has been known as Hull since the beginning of the twenties. Before that, it was known as Wright and covered a large part of the territory that is now the riding of Gatineau. At the time of Confederation, it was called the riding of Ottawa, on the Quebec side.

Thus, the name itself is not terribly important. The town of Aylmer—not yet but perhaps and probably a city in the near future—has grown enormously, owing to a considerable increase in population. The proportion of people from what is called Aylmer in the riding of Hull is increasing, and this fact probably should receive recognition.

However, I do not agree with the procedure for changing a riding's name. I have always maintained this position during the fourteen years I have been in the Senate, and I shall continue to do so. It should be done before an Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Commission or the House of Commons during the debate on reports by the Commission. I have always disapproved of doing so by means of a public bill, and even if the riding happens to be my own, I still disapprove.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I must inform the Senate that if Senator Leblanc rises to speak at this time, this will close the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, in reply to the first speaker, Senator Flynn, I have been told and assured that there is no question of replacing the returning officer. The same one will be reappointed—

Senator Flynn: Reappointed?

Senator Leblanc: Of course, he will be reappointed.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He does not need to be reappointed; this is petty patronage!

Senator Leblanc: In any case, I have been given the assurance that the returning officer will be the same, and I have discussed this with the member for Hull, whose constituency will soon be called Hull-Aylmer.

Now, to reply to Senator Lafond, we have to remember, as he said so well, that the Town of Aylmer has expanded and now has a population of 35,000. According to my information, Aylmer has never been identified in any designation of the federal electoral district.

The present member is being pressured to have Aylmer identified as it has reached a certain maturity. As mentioned earlier by Senator Lafond, it will probably soon become a city. While the population of Hull has decreased a bit, Aylmer has grown in a spectacular fashion.

Therefore, to please the people of Aylmer who are demanding to be recognized, I believe that it would be appropriate to accept the change suggested by the representative of the riding, especially as this name will remain for years to come.

Senator Lafond: I would like to make a correction. I do not believe that the population of Hull has decreased. It may have been overtaken by neighbouring municipalities, but its population has not decreased.

Senator Leblanc: Fine, I accept that.

Senator Asselin: Would Senator Leblanc allow a question?

Senator Leblanc: Yes.

Senator Asselin: Does Senator Leblanc intend to refer this bill to the appropriate committee of the Senate to hear the views of those who are asking for this change?

Senator Leblanc: Personally, I do not see any need to refer the bill to a committee.

Senator Asselin: I would like to hear the representative of the riding.

Senator Leblanc: I wonder whether this would help the debate that much. We might hear representatives from the Aylmer and Hull Municipal Councils, but I wonder whether this would be of any use since, at least according to my information, the people in Hull and Aylmer agree on the name change.

Senator Asselin: Well, they can come and tell us what we would like to know.

Senator Leblanc: I have no intention of referring the bill to a committee. In fact, with leave of the Senate, since I could be elsewhere tomorrow afternoon, I even intend to ask that third reading follow immediately after second reading if possible.

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Flynn: It is asking too much.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, as I mentioned earlier in my speech at the second reading stage, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be now read a third time.

Senator Asselin: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved the second reading of Bill C-12, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977.

He said: Honourable senators, while this bill is somewhat complicated, largely because of its interrelations with other legislation and because of the technical difficulties required to be overcome to effect the main purposes of the bill, the main purpose of the bill itself can be very simply stated. It is to restrict the increases in the per capita transfer payments to the provinces in support of post-secondary education in 1983-84 to 6 per cent above the 1982-83 levels, and to restrict such increases in 1984-85 to 5 per cent.

There is no such restriction which respect to the transfers in support of other expenditures under the Established Programs Financing Act, specifically for medical care insurance and for hospital insurance. I repeat, there is no restriction on the increases in the transfer of payments for these other items in the established programs financing package.

In order to enable the post-secondary education transfers to be limited in this way, the established programs financing transfers have been separated as between the post-secondary education federal transfers and those relating to medical care and hospital insurance. The PSE expenditures are then reduced to a per capita figure which can be escalated by 6 per cent and 5 per cent in the two years referred to and then, of course, multiplied by the population of each province to determine the PSE transfer to which the province is entitled.

The effect of the population increases in the provinces of Canada will raise the dollar value of these transfers for the whole of Canada from 6 per cent to approximately 6 per cent in the 1984-85 year, but, of course, these additional increases will not be uniformly distributed in each province of Canada because the population changes will not be uniform in each province.

Let me repeat once more: The escalated figure for medical and hospital-related transfers will not be restricted and will continue to rise with the rise in the national economy as measured by the gross national product escalator which has been in effect since the 1977 legislation. The main point of the bill is to make the six-and-five program apply to the fiscal year just closed and to the fiscal year just beginning.

I should also point out some other changes. Clause 1 of the bill, for example, changes the name of the legislation from the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977 to the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, 1977. As has been stated in this chamber previously by a number of senators, including myself, the reason for this is obvious, and that is, the federal government has become somewhat disaffected by the lack of visibility of its support to post-secondary education.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Tragic!

Senator Hicks: Some of the consequences have really been tragic. It was felt that by including the term "post-secondary education" specifically in the title of the act, it might draw a bit more attention to the very substantial contribution which the Government of Canada makes to our institutions of higher education.

Senator Flynn: Childish.

Senator Hicks: Clauses 10 to 13 of the bill, among other things, replace the present designations of medical care insurance and hospital insurance by the one phrase, "insured health services." Amendments consequential on the coming into force of the Canada Health Act—which, of course, was not determined at the time this bill was passed in the House of Commons but has since come to pass—are also contained in clauses 10 to 13. That is to say, certain consequential changes have been made to make this bill link properly with the new Canada Health Act.

A new clause 9 was added to the bill in the House of Commons. That, I think, is a very interesting and useful step. I will read it to you because I think it is important that senators be familiar with it. The motion was that the bill be amended by adding a new clause 9 as follows:

The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

24.1 (1) The Secretary of State shall cause to be laid before each House of Parliament, not later than the fifth sitting day of that House after the 31st day of January next following the end of each fiscal year that begins after March 31, 1984, a report for that fiscal year on

(a) cash contributions and total equalized tax transfers in respect of the post-secondary education financing program applicable to each province;

(b) expenditures by each province on post-secondary education;

(c) any other federal programs of support to or involvement in post-secondary education;

(d) the relationship between such federal contributions, transfers and programs and Canada's educational and economic goals; and

(e) the results of any consultation by or on behalf of the Secretary of State with the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada relating to the definition of national purposes to be served by post-secondary education and the means by which the governments of Canada and the provinces will achieve those purposes.

(2) Every report laid before Parliament under subsection (1) shall be referred to review to such standing committee of the House of Commons, of the Senate or of both Houses of Parliament as is designated by Parliament for that purpose.

Then there is a provision that the succeeding clauses be appropriately renumbered.

Finally, clause 14 of the bill provides that the first nine clauses dealing with the transfer of payments themselves come into force on April 1, 1983, and that clauses 10 to 13, the remainder, will come into force when the Canada Health Act comes into force, which will mean that, as soon as this bill has received Royal Assent, those clauses will also be in effect.

● (1430)

It should also be remembered that these restrictions on the post-secondary education transfer payments apply only to the two fiscal years that I have mentioned. In 1985-86 and in subsequent years the PSE transfers revert to the previous arrangements and are again calculated with respect to the gross national product escalator.

[Senator Hicks.]

There is one other thing I should point out to honourable senators. In the year 1983-84, due to the recalculation by Statistics Canada of the gross national product, there was a windfall that occurred in the total transfer payments to the provinces, both for medical care and for post-secondary education. This windfall amounts to $769 million for both the health care and post-secondary education programs. This $769 million is built into the base figure for purposes of escalation in subsequent years.

Honourable senators, I should perhaps refer briefly to the magnitude of these transfer payments. All established program financing—that is, health services plus post-secondary education—in 1982-83 amounted to a little more than $12 billion. In 1983-84, this figure rose to $13.5 billion. In 1984-85, it is estimated to reach $14.7 billion. The transfer payments relating only to post-secondary education amounted, in 1982-83, to $3.7 billion; in 1983-84, to almost $4 billion; and, in 1984-85, are estimated to be about $4.2 billion.

On February 18, 1982, speaking in a debate resulting from an inquiry initiated by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie into the support of post-secondary education institutions in Canada, I pointed out that the application of these funds which are transferred to the provinces varied substantially from province to province. I attached to Hansard of that day a set of tables showing exactly the position with respect to each of the ten provinces of Canada. I will not go over those figures again today, but should any honourable senator want to look at them, they appear at pages 3658 to 3665 of Hansard for February 18, 1982. Suffice it to say that these tables show that three of the four Atlantic provinces were not granting to post-secondary education institutions as much support as they received from Ottawa itself. I think that the figure in Prince Edward Island showed that the transfer payments amounted to about 110 per cent of the total grants to universities in that province, and the figures were nearly as high in Newfoundland and in New Brunswick. In this present year, the province of British Columbia will receive over 5 per cent more than it did last year because it is one of the provinces that has had a significant population increase, and the 5 per cent applies only to the per capita transfer; it will then be multiplied by the real population in the province in the year concerned. Despite the fact that that province will be receiving more than 5 per cent additional in this year, it is reported that British Columbia will be cutting back by at least 3 per cent—and some of the figures I have seen indicate as much as 5 per cent—in the actual dollar grants to the universities. If I understand correctly, the cut-back in the basic university grant is 5 per cent in British Columbia, but the province is then making certain other supplementary payments so that the total quantity of funds involved in the reduction may work out to be only 3 per cent.

Honourable senators, that is the bill which is before us. Some of my academic colleagues may wonder why I was willing to sponsor this bill. The reason is that I think that the federal government has a pretty good record with respect to transfer payments in support of post-secondary education institutions. Honourable senators known from previous speeches I have made in this chamber, and particularly my speech of February 1982, that I did not approve the basis of the 1977 Fiscal Arrangements Act. I felt that it transferred moneys to the provinces without any checks, without any guarantee that the moneys would be used either for the purposes for which the transfer had been calculated or to further the aims of the federal government in transferring money in support of post-secondary education. I must be careful; I am not accusing any of the provinces of illegally committing funds, and so on, but the fact remains the funds which were transferred to some provinces, intended to be applied to the support of post-secondary education, must have been used by those provinces for purposes not connected with post-secondary education at all.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: That's politics!

Senator Hicks: Well, I think that is a little too harsh, Senator Thériault; politicians have to build roads and bridges as well as to support universities, although I might suggest that at some time we should have a debate on the subject in this chamber, in that there is real cause to be concerned about the level of support of universities and post-secondary education institutions in this country today. If Canada is going to play its part in the highly technological world into which we are moving, then we cannot afford to fall behind in this important area. We have fallen behind in comparison with some other developed countries and in comparison with the efforts that we, ourselves, were making in the 1960s and early 1970s.

Honourable senators, I think that I could do no better than to conclude by reading what I said in my speech of February 1982.

Let me conclude by reiterating that I place myself among the very front ranks of those who appreciate the importance to our country, not only of our universities but also of our other institutions of post-secondary education. Perhaps in the highly technological society in which we are living today, some of these are even more important than the classical or traditional university.

I do not wish to see the finances of post-secondary education institutions diminished. Indeed, increases should more than keep pace with inflation and should enable universities to meet Canada's needs in the important years ahead in this century. It would seem to me, as I have said before, that the federal government's support is on the whole cognizant of these needs. I believe that provincial governments and provincial politicians must do more than talk about their provincial rights and responsibilities in education; that they too must provide a fair and adequate measure of support, which some of them, riding on the coat-tails of the federal government, have not been doing during the last decade or the last 15 years.

It is for these reasons, honourable senators, that I move the second reading of this bill and solicit your support for it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Before the honourable senator terminates his very eloquent statement, I wonder if he would permit a question? I understood him to say that there is nothing illegal about a province's not spending on education the entire amount that it has received from Ottawa for that purpose. My question is: Has Ottawa protested or indicated that it plans to take any steps in respect of, for example, Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland, with regard to this failure on the part of the provinces to utilize all of the money that has been transferred to them from Ottawa for educational purposes?

Senator Hicks: I do not think that Ottawa has made such formal protests. I think that, at the time of the Established Programs Financing legislation in 1977, politicians, including federal politicians, were so concerned lest they trample upon the rights of the provinces in the field of post-secondary education that, while they calculated moneys which respect to these costs, they transferred them with no strings attached. There can be no question that there was anything illegal about the application of these funds by Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland, to name the two provinces that have been mentioned.

I believe that the new clause 9 of the bill, which I read, which requires a report on these transfers to be laid before both houses of Parliament each year, including not only the federal contributions but also the provincial expenditures, will at least make sure that the facts are placed squarely before members of Parliament in both houses; and perhaps that will have a salutary effect on the expenditure of the funds, particularly in those provinces that might be expected to put forth a little more effort than they have been doing in the past.

● (1440)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the honourable senator a question with respect to new clause 9 of the bill, which requires a report respecting expenditures on the part of the provinces? Who will compile those figures? Will that be done by the federal authorities, or will the federal authorities ask the provinces to furnish them with the information so that they may report to Parliament?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): And rely on them.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I should think that the report would have to be compiled by the federal Department of Finance. I suppose there is the possibility that they may not get the kind of co-operation from the provinces that they want; but there will be time to review that situation when we have had a look at the first report.

The tables to which I referred in my February 1982 speech were stated at that time to have been prepared by the provinces for a meeting of education ministers in 1981. Some honourable senators may recall that the Secretary to the Council of Ministers of Education objected to that and claimed that the tables were not so prepared. I made a correcting statement in this house a few weeks later acknowledging that, but pointing out that while the Council of Ministers said that they did not assume the responsibility for preparing the tables, there was no suggestion of any kind that the tables were in any way inaccurate.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I raise the point simply because of past experience of this matter. In days gone by, one of the serious bones of contention between provincial treasurers and the federal Minister of Finance was the accuracy of the figures, because the federal Minister of Finance was using figures in connection with transfer payments to provinces, and with respect to expenditures by provinces, which the provinces did not accept as being accurate.

I would simply suggest to my honourable friend that short of amending the bill—which personally I would be inclined to do—I hope that when the bill reaches committee we can get some undertaking by the federal authorities that they will, in fact, reconcile their figures with the figures of the provinces before attempting to display this information in any reports to Parliament.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I believe that to be a highly desirable suggestion, and I will certainly support it in any way I can. I might point out that clause 9, the reporting clause, was not a government measure. It was inserted into the bill in the other place upon the urging of certain members of Parliament, most of whom I believe were opposition members. However, that can be gone into when the bill is before committee. It would certainly be desirable if we could obtain the assurance of some responsible person in either the Department of Finance or the Treasury Board that these reports will be made accurately and in a manner acceptable to the provinces.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: May I ask a question to Senator Hicks concerning the real meaning of clause 9(d), if I remember correctly? It has to do with the report that the minister responsible would lay before both Houses concerning the results of any consultations by or on behalf of the Secretary of State with the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada relating to the definition of national purposes to be served by post-secondary education.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is subclause (e).

Senator Tremblay: Quite so, I do not have the bill before me. I stand corrected. It is indeed clause 9(e) where reference is made to a report by the Secretary of State on the results of any consultations relating to the definition of national purposes to be served by post-secondary education and the means by which the governments of Canada and the provinces will achieve those purposes.

As worded, that clause looks very innocuous. It must be there for something. It does not sound like much, but it would appear that if there are any consultations, the minister would have to report on those consultations. So far, it might be said that it is not a hypothetical question or legislation, but it seems to me that there is something hidden behind that test.

I wish Senator Hicks would give us more explanations at this point. If the bill is sent to committee, the Secretary of State will appear before us to explain himself. I point out that this is something quite unusual in a federal piece of legislation.

[Senator Hicks.]

Keeping in mind the nature of federal-provincial relations in that field, and the distribution of legislative powers in this country, I would point out for now—I will say more about this later—that it is quite unusual to write into a federal law the vaguest of intentions to produce an annual report on consultations, if any, and to even suggest that national purposes would thus be negotiated between the two levels of government.

[English]

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I cannot disagree with the honourable senator. As a matter of fact, he referred to subclause (d) which also appears to be somewhat vague. It says that he is to report upon:

(d) the relationship between such federal contributions, transfers and programs and Canada's educational and economic goals; . . .

I consider that to be rather vague. There could be all kinds of opinions as to exactly what those relationships were and as to what things were or were not relevant.

Moving on to subclause (e), to which the honourable senator referred, this does not require anyone to do anything. If honourable senators will read the subclause carefully, it says the Secretary of State is to report upon:

(e) the results of any consultations by or on behalf of the Secretary of State with the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada relating to the definition of . . .

That does not require any such consultations to take place. It merely requires the Secretary of State to report on the consultations if, in fact, by some other authority there have been consultations.

Senator Flynn: Would the honourable senator say that the national objectives would be different from provincial objectives?

Senator Hicks: I do not believe I said that.

Senator Flynn: You did not say that. I am asking you.

Senator Hicks: I beg your pardon. I suppose, yes. There are some objectives that would be of national significance to a much greater extent than some others. The reason I referred to that clause was to point out that there could be so many opinions as to exactly what constituted a national objective or a provincial objective, and which objectives were on all fours both within the provinces and the nation as a whole.

Senator Flynn: And the Constitution.

Senator Roblin: It is pretty sloppy drafting.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Kelly, debate adjourned.

SENATE REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—
DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform, tabled in the Senate on January 31, 1983—(Honourable Senator Leblanc).

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, in his brief presented before the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform, Professor Léon Dion of Laval University said:

I do not believe that, given Quebec's refusal to recognize the Constitutional Act of 1982 and the little enthusiasm in the rest of the country for undertaking constitutional revision, that it is timely to become thoroughly involved in the process right now. I even consider that it is not prudent to do it.

I am of the same opinion, and although I agree with most of the recommendations of the committee, of which I have the honour to be a member, I prefer to propose a three-stage procedure for Senate reform, which I shall explain later on. I feel that a step-by-step approach would receive the support of the provinces and would certainly be more acceptable to the government and people of Quebec.

In December 1983, during the week that Parliament was to be prorogued, the committee made a final, three-day sprint to incorporate in the draft report the changes approved by the majority of members present. At the end of the three days, the two co-chairmen, whom I wish to congratulate on their dedication and understanding—I see one of them in the Speaker's chair today, and I offer him my sincere congratulations for the committee's excellent work—asked for a final vote on the corrected version. The committee barely had a quorum, that is ten members. Nine members voted in favour of approving the corrected text, without seeing the final version. Personally, I felt I had to vote against the report, which I did not see again until it appeared in its final printed form on the day it was tabled in Parliament.

I voted against the draft of the final report, not because I was against all the recommendations the seven paragraphs contained. On the contrary, and here I wish to thank members of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament and representatives of the Parliamentary Centre for External Affairs and External Trade, who worked together with me on an ongoing basis, helping me to prepare my presentations to the other members of the committee.

Although I did object to the substance of some paragraphs, I also, and especially, objected to the type of presentation suggested for the report.

I suppose my attitude came as no surprise, because since my appointment to the Senate, I have made three speeches in which I clearly indicate my views concerning Senate Reform, and I am referring to speeches made on April 24, 1980, March 3, 1982, and April 29, 1982.

Initially, like all other members of the committee, I listened to our many witnesses with an open and very receptive mind. However, none of the witnesses was able to convince me that I should revise the opinions expressed in my speeches or that any of my convictions, as reflected in the Lamontagne-Goldenberg report, were obsolete. So there was no conversion upon hearing the testimony. Many witnesses imagined that Senate reform is a panacea for the problems raised during the hearings, and for the problems existing in this country generally.

Many witnesses stated that the people of Canada wanted a reformed Senate, and that most of the electorate preferred an elected Senate. However, according to surveys published by the Canada West Foundation in December 1983, that is not entirely true. The surveys revealed that 35 per cent of Canadians preferred a reformed Senate, 28 per cent preferred to see the Senate remain unchanged, 16 per cent wanted to abolish the Senate and 20 per cent had no opinion.

Irrespective of the powers of the structure of the Senate, I feel it will be impossible to get rid of the economic, geographic, demographic and cultural factors in this country that are at the root of many of these problems and which, paradoxically, are also this country's great strength.

Professor Peter Russell of the University of Toronto made the following comments to the committee:

The first one is: Is there a problem in Canada today, a serious pressing problem of regional alienation that is related to the lack of adequate regional representation in the national government? Is that an urgent problem? The second is: If it is a problem, is it one best addressed by Senate reform? The third is: Even if Senate reform or some other reform to address regional alienation is needed today, is this the time to do it? Are the times ripe and propitious to indulge in major constitutional overhaul? Basically, I am going to answer no to all three parts of my question.

Briefly, is there a severe problem of regional alienation right now? My answer to that would be that there have always been regional tensions and strains in this country. Your own Senator Frith, in his address to you six months ago, went over that material quite well and read into the record of the Senate debates many passages from learned Canadian academics on the continuation of regional tensions, not only in this federation but in all federations, and I might say, in unitary states, too. England and France have regional tensions and strains and they will always be with us.

I shall refrain from repeating the points I made in my three speeches concerning the recommendations expressed in the latest report on Senate reform. However, I would like to recall the suggestions I made to the committee on ways of implementing Senate reform.

I suggest a three-stage reform: first, internal short-term reforms, which, if they had been implemented in the past would have made it unnecessary to have another committee in 1983. These reforms, controlled by the Senate itself, would have to be implemented immediately.

Second, medium-term reforms which might call for legislative amendments by the Canadian Parliament, either the adoption of new laws or constitutional amendments pursuant to the powers given to Parliament under section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Finally, the third stage, long-term reforms which would require the agreement of the Canadian Parliament and of at least seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the people, as provided for in section 42(1)(b) of the same act.

● (1500)

The long-term reforms would be very difficult to implement, according—among others—to Professor Robert Jackson of Carleton University, whom I quote:

Naturally, impractical reform proposals do not even deserve our attention. There will be much difference among all proposals because of the need to avoid four obstacles: the Senate, the Commons, the executive power and the provincial governments, more or less in that order of difficulty. A fertile constitutional imagination will be required to jump over those obstacles.

With respect to the first stage, namely short-term internal reforms, my suggestions and my recommendations flow mostly from the 1980 report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and from the evidence given the numerous parliamentarians and academics who attended the hearings. It must be noted that a great many of those people endorse the Lamontagne report to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks. According to Professor Peter Russell, whom I quote again:

The third approach is the one that interests me the most, and that is in modification of what you have now, a Senate appointed by the federal level of government. You already have, it seems to me, some very interesting suggestions on that model in the Lamontagne subcommittee report to which I have already referred; and I know some members of this committee were on that subcommittee of the Senate, so I do not want to go through it in detail.

But let me just suggest that there are a couple of suggestions in the Lamontagne report, if I can call it that, which I think are well worth taking up. The advantage of them, as I see them, is twofold. Some of them can be done without formal constitutional change. Second, those proposals address the two classic purposes of the upper House of a federation.

Professor Russell is in favour of reforming the Senate appointment procedure and of thinking of the Senate committee proceedings in terms of the regions.

And, according to the Honourable Eugene Forsey:

Most of the proposals of the Lamontagne report for improving the work of the Senate and the representativeness of the Senate do not require any constitutional amendment whatsoever. Most of them do not even require legislation, ordinary legislation passed by the two Houses of the Parliament.

I am not going to ask you to swallow the Lamontagne report line, hook and sinker. I do think that it merits very careful attention, and the proposals it puts forward for Senate reform are proposals which would in fact do a great deal to meet many of the objections to the existing Senate.

Many changes were proposed by witnesses who appeared before the committee, most of them stemming from recommendations in previous reports. Those changes would not require amendments to existing legislation or to the Constitution, but only decisions by the government and the Senate, and they might contribute to enhance the image of the Senate and its credibility as a legislative institution; others might also strengthen its role as spokesman for regional interests before the institutions of the central government.

First, there are the vacancies in the Senate. At the time of the hearings, there were 20 vacant seats, and there are now 12, if I am not mistaken. One seat for New Brunswick has now been vacant for 12 years. Such vacancies undermine the credibility of the Senate as a legislative body, reduce its ability, especially at the committee level, to fulfill adequately its legislative functions of consideration and investigation. All Canadian regions are deprived of their full complement of representatives in the Upper Chamber. A paper dated November 30, 1983—submitted by Senator Le Moine and myself—following consideration of the first draft of the report for the committee, uses rather harsh language about the prejudice caused by these vacancies. The 12 seats now vacant should be filled as soon as possible; any further vacancy should be filled within a period of six months to one year, as many witnesses as well as our report have already recommended.

There is also the immediate possibility of making certain important changes to the Rules of the Senate, especially changes which could increase the credibility of senators in the legislative process. First—and some senators may not like what I am about to say but it matters not—there is the high rate of absenteeism in the case of a number of senators. Many recommendations have been made to correct the situation; they all involve a common requirement, namely that senators should behave as senators.

Second, changes in sitting times and days. The committee received various recommendations in this regard and all of them had some value. I would like to quote Rule of the Senate No. 13, which provides the following:

Unless otherwise ordered, when the Senate adjourns on Friday, it should stand adjourned until the Monday following.

I do not have the impression that Rule 13 has been applied too often, at least not since my appointment to this place.

Third, a change in the legislative role of the Senate. While the Senate plays its role efficiently given the time exigencies related to the legislation referred to it by the House of Commons, recommendations have been made in previous briefs or reports about possible improvements to its responsibilities in the legislating and investigating process.

Fourth, the investigating role of the Senate, especially through its committees, has become increasingly important in various areas, namely the social, technological, commercial and regional fields. The effectiveness of the Senate in this regard has earned much praise and several recommendations were made to increase its responsibilities in this area.

Fifth, the importance given to regional representation in the terms of reference of the committee has led many to conclude that only an elected Senate could do a good job. However, some of the recommendations aimed at improving the present system, including changes in the appointment process, would allow the Senate to represent regional interests more effectively, such as establishing a committee on regionalism, creating regional caucusses which would include representatives of all parties on a provincial basis, appointing senators to the board of directors of certain crown corporations, and finally, approving the appointments made by the Governor in Council to crown agencies and corporations.

Sixth, changing the method for selecting senators may be the most important aspect of Senate reform from the point of view of the credibility of this institution and its ability to represent regional interests and fulfill its duties efficiently. Those who appeared before the committee were nearly all unanimous in reproving the present method of appointment and the duration of the senatorial term; these criticisms echo recommendations contained in previous reports. There are many other options, including straight election which I do not favour for the moment; I shall explain why later on. It would be possible to change the method of appointment up to a point without having to amend the Constitution. The committee received many suggestions about the duration of the term in the Senate and the party system in this house. At least two witnesses, Professor Peter Russell and the Honourable Eugene Forsey have maintained that the term of appointment could be changed without amending the Constitution under a gentlemen's agreement applying to newly appointed senators. I may add that this would require changes in certain administrative matters such as seniority and the Senate's pension plan.

These reform proposals could be implemented in the long or short term, with the understanding that some are much more controversial and troublesome than others. The second stage for the changes which I have proposed would give rise to technical problems requiring medium-term solutions: These are the reform proposals which would require legislative or constitutional amendments to Clause 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Such changes could certainly prove more difficult to make, but it may be argued that they have generally greater range and significance than the immediate reforms which I have just suggested. They are the following: First, the elimination of the need to a land-owner.

Second, voluntary early retirement on a pension in line with that paid to retired members of the House of Commons.

Third, the appointment of the Speaker and other dignitaries by either the senators or caucusses.

Fourth, the denial process concerning the Rules and Statutes.

Fifth, the ratification of treaties.

I feel that the changes which I have just proposed as part of the first two stages of a progressive reform of the Senate, would greatly enhance the prestige of this House and its capacity to play a major role in the parliamentary process of this country.

This brings us to the third stage, that of the long term reforms for which we would need the support of at least seven provinces with at least 50 per cent of the total population of Canada. These reforms include the replacement of the absolute veto by a suspensive veto, as suggested in the report, the application of the double majority concept to linguistic and cultural issues, and an elected Senate.

Early in my remarks, I indicated that I was against the format of the report. As a matter of fact, I wish the emphasis had been put on the possible immediate reforms in the first two stages instead of raising the impossible issue of a short term election.

Indeed, provincial governments and Parliament would find it very difficult, if not downright impossible, to agree on the functions of this new Senate, on its powers, purpose, membership and activities. It seems impossible to me, at least for the time being, that this recommendation could receive enough support from the legislatures of Canada to be implemented. In my mind, it is doubtful that such a recommendation could generate a strong enough commitment from the political parties now represented in Parliament to expect that it could be implemented in the foreseeable future. Even if all these difficulties were overcome, the necessary legislative and constitutional procedures would still require several years. For these reasons, I recommended that the committee should put the emphasis on all the measures and reforms that could be proceeded with quickly in order to start some kind of reform.

After a few years of experimentation with such a reformed Senate, we will be in a better position to evaluate the benefits, the necessity and the feasibility of a constitutional reform.

I could mention several other arguments against the immediate implementation of the proposal for an elected Senate, as I did in previous speeches before this honourable chamber; however, I prefer to put the emphasis on the first two steps.

It may be desirable in the future to have an elected Senate in Canada, after having ironed out all the difficulties that such a move would entail. I am convinced that we should start immediately to reform our institution ourselves, by implementing some of the short-term recommendations which were put before the committee and which are advocated by several senators. Indeed, several senators who spoke before me in this debate have supported such a process in order to improve our image in the general public which expects the Senate to serve its interest as best we can.

One thing is sure; this is the twilight of the Senate in its present form and whatever changes are made, they will have strong impact not only on the Canadian parliamentary system but also on the very future of the political system and the well-being of all Canadians.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 10, 1984

The Senate met at 2.00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Thursday, May 10, 1984

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

FIRST REPORT

Your Committee, pursuant to its Order of Reference of Tuesday, February 7, 1984, has considered the subject matter of the motion presented by Honourable Senator Herbert Sparrow. The motion reads as follows:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to hear submissions from representatives of the agricultural, fisheries, forestry and related industries; and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required to carry out its mandate.

Your Committee is of the view that the issue raised by the second part of the motion concerning the engagement of staff is a matter that should be scrutinized by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and by the Senate itself because of the inherent budgetary implications. Accordingly, your Committee expresses no views on that part of the motion.

During the deliberations of your Committee several members expressed concern over the precedent that could be set by the adoption of the first part of the motion. There may be costs imposed on the budget of the Senate if, pursuant to Rule 83, witnesses were reimbursed for their travelling and living expenses. Although this would not likely be a major problem in the case of a single committee, your Committee is of the view that other committees of the Senate would request similar authorizations.

While some reservations were felt about the implications of the motion, members of your Committee recognized the value in permitting the appearance of witnesses who may be available on short notice. This is particularly so in the case of individuals and organizations who have been invited to appear before a committee of the House of Commons and who wish to present their views to the Senate through one of its committees. It should certainly be considered to be in the interests of both the Senate and the citizenry that there be as few limitations on access as possible.

Your Committee is of the opinion that the best way to proceed at this experimental stage is by a motion having effect for the present session rather than by the adoption of change to the Rules of the Senate. This procedure has previously been used by the Senate to authorize its select committees to meet during an adjournment of the Senate that exceeds a week.

Your Committee therefore recommends that the Senate adopt the following motion:

That, for the duration of the present session, any select committee may, on its own initiative,

- a) notwithstanding Rule 76(2), where the Senate adjourns for a week or less, and
- b) pursuant to Rule 76(3), where the adjournment exceeds a week, send for a person who is visiting the National Capital Region and hear and consider the evidence of that person on a matter that Rule 67 describes as being one that shall be referred to that committee.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS L. MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

FIFTH REPORT PRESENTED

Hon. William J. Petten, Chairman of the Committee of Selection, presented the following report:

FIFTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 66(1)(b), your committee submits herewith the list of Senators nominated by it to serve on the Special Senate Committee on problems facing Canadian youth.

The Honourable Senators Cools, Gigantès, Hébert, Marsden, Stollery, Tremblay, Yuzyk.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM J. PETTEN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Before this report is adopted, honourable senators, I would like to have some information and ask a question of Senator Petten.

Since this committee has been struck to find answers to the problems of young Canadians who have been left to fend for themselves ever since this government came to power, and since half a million of them are looking for jobs, will these young people have an idea of the findings of the committee and the answers to their problems by reading an interim report made available to them, say in September, so that they will know how to vote in the next general election? They will want to know whether answers have been found to some of their problems, and I think it would be fair that they know whether they should support the government or another political party. Come September, they ought to know whether certain formulas and certain answers to their problems have been found.

My question is this: Since it is urgent that this important committee be appointed, will it be able to produce an interim report by September 1?

[English]

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, the committee must sit first in order for it to make an interim report, or any report for that matter. If the motion is adopted now, the committee can hold an organization meeting and get to work.

Senator Asselin: I am not ready to give my consent to have the report adopted now. Before I do so, I wish to know if there will be a preliminary report or whether there will be a report after six months' time.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, that is something for the committee to decide.

Senator Asselin: I am not ready to give my consent. I want to have this information before I give my consent.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, if leave is not granted, I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

NOTICE OF ENQUIRY

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, May 15, 1984, I shall call the attention of the Senate to the important changes being proposed to the Western Grain Stabilization Act so as to make the said act more responsive to producers' needs.

● (1410)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister a question in connection with this statement? Apparently he proposes to make a statement in the Senate which, in effect, I suspect, will be similar to the second reading discussion of the amendments proposed to the Western Grain Stabilization Act. Is that linked in any way with the introduction of the bill covering this matter in the House of Commons?

Senator Argue: I believe that the motion, prior to the introduction of the bill, was moved in the other place yesterday. I thought the Senate might wish to have an explanation of the provisions of the bill, for the information and comment of honourable senators. If they do not wish me to proceed with the statement, I will certainly conform to the wishes of the Senate.

The bill will be introduced in the other place, of course, because its provisions entail the expenditure of public funds. Eventually the bill will reach the Senate, so I thought this might be a way for the Senate to be involved in the discussion of the provisions of that legislation during a normal sitting of the Senate. I understand that the Senate may not be sitting next week.

Senator Roblin: I have some reservations about the suggestion. This seems to be yet another way of the Senate's being seized of the matter before it comes to us in the normal course of events. It resembles—to some extent, at least—our pre-study procedure. I will not maintain my position to the point of refusing to listen to my honourable friend if he wishes to make a speech, but I give him my opinion that perhaps it might be better not to introduce some new device for discussing these bills that is different from our usual procedure. If he thought that a pre-study might be advisable, we might do that instead. I do not like the idea of introducing another method of anticipating regular discussion in the Senate.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I do not know whether or not this is "another method," but certainly the technique of presenting a motion of inquiry is an old technique that can be followed. Yesterday Senator Roblin asked me questions about the provisions of the bill, and, because of his great interest in the bill, I was led to believe that he was anxious to have information. I thought this might be a tidy way of bringing forward that information. I am proposing the motion, which can be debated if senators consider it advisable.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Léopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 22, 1984, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION

FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development in connection with the recent statement issued by the Canada Development Investment Corporation in Vancouver on April 13 last, at which time I believe the corporation also made available its statements for last year. I would ask my honourable friend if he intends to give us a quarterly report for the first quarter of this year. He has been giving much encouragement to think that there will be what I think he calls "full and timely disclosure." When does the minister think the report for the first quarter of 1984 will be available?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): I believe it was included with the annual report that was forwarded to you today. I shall have to make an inquiry but it is my information that the first quarter was reported on in mid-April. If the honourable senator does not have the documentation on the first quarter, I shall certainly see it is made available.

Senator Roblin: I shall make the same search as my honourable friend, because those documents were deposited on my desk this morning and I have not had a chance to look at them yet.

THE DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED

FINANCIAL STATUS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the minister will give us some information about some of the observations made in the statement of April 13 with respect to de Havilland Aircraft. It says on page 3 of that report that a degree of market protection will be sought for de Havilland in order to make it possible for the company to continue in business. It says, for example, that there will be a net cost of some $200 million over the next ten years if certain conditions obtain. One of those conditions refers to market protection. What does that mean? Is it quotas or tariffs or licences? Is it to prevent other people from selling in our market to give de Havilland some protection within Canada? I presume that there is no protection that can be provided outside Canada. What is meant by that statement?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I was not given notice by Senator Roblin of this line of questioning. I would ask him to either read that portion of the statement to which he is referring or I shall take the question as notice and respond after I have had a chance to consider it carefully.

Senator Roblin: I had anticipated that my honourable friend would have a copy of the statement with him because with his usual perspicacity I think he probably expected me to start talking about this matter sooner or later. But if he does not have the report here I admit that he is under some disadvantage when trying to answer, because I have three or four more questions that have to do with same report. Probably the most helpful thing I can do would be to ask my honourable friend to furnish himself with a copy, and the next time we meet I will pursue some of those questions.

I have some other points that are not as detailed as the one I just asked that, perhaps, he could shed some light on. The government has been saying that there will be a further loss of $200 million on the de Havilland program over the next ten years. That was indicated in the statement of April 13 and my honourable friend is, no doubt, familiar with it. A document was produced on April 19 which appears to be a study of de Havilland's future course and it gives some different figures. It states that there will be a loss of some $313 million by 1988, which is only four years away. Can my honourable friend offer any reconciliation on those two estimates?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the document of April 19 was prepared in the cabinet process by officials of CDIC and given to senior economic officials of the government for their discussion. As yet it has not been referred to me nor has it been the subject of a briefing to me by officials, so I cannot provide Senator Roblin with a response to his question at this time. However, in the hope of some small guidance, I will say that when I appeared before a press conference on, I believe, April 10, I said that de Havilland would incur costs of about $200 million over ten years as their operating costs on the cycle of the Dash-8 program, subject to several premises. As Senator Roblin is a business man, he will know that one of the variables is, of course, the cost of interest.

• (1420)

I made it clear to the press, and in fact there was a lively debate between Mr. Bell and myself as to how de Havilland would be financed by the Minister of Finance.

I am very eager for the Minister of Finance to provide financing for the Dash-8 program in the form of equity rather than asking de Havilland to carry a new load of debt on its books with respect to the Dash-8. That, however, remains unsettled. I am in the hands of my banker, the Minister of Finance.

As to the rest of your question, I will have to say that I will shortly consider the document of April 19 and will be in a position to respond within two or three weeks. I would be happy to give Senator Roblin notice that I am ready to respond so that he and I can arrange to be present for Question Period on the same day to continue with this line of questioning.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend be kind enough to give me a copy of the document of April 19, because if he is going to examine it and make it the basis for some discussion, I think it is only right that that document be made public and made available to people such as myself.

Senator Austin: Senator Roblin is an experienced parliamentarian and knows that a document in the form of a draft memorandum to the cabinet is subject to the usual security provisions of the Privy Council Office. I am unable to make it available to him under the rules of the Privy Council Office.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry to hear that, because my impression is that it is not a cabinet document, but a working document prepared by officials of CDIC and, as such, perhaps could be considered to be in a different category.

What bothers me with all of these activities of the government is that we find the money is spent or, indeed, committed before any approbation is sought from Parliament. What I am trying to do by asking this series of questions—and we will continue this at a later date—is to have the government inform the Senate in advance as to what the monetary requirements are likely to be, because it frustrates the parliamentary purpose to find we have no alternative, as has been suggested to us before, but simply to agree with the decision of the government. In other words, there is no prior information as to the commitments; they are made and if the credit of the Government of Canada is to stand, there is nothing we can do but agree with that. That cannot be the right way to do business, and I ask my honourable friend to produce that document so that we may have a better idea of what is taking place. He has spoken eloquently about the need for full disclosure. Well, I agree with him and think that he should disclose this document.

I wish to make another reference to a quotation made by the president of CDIC, Mr. Joel Bell, to find out what is meant by it. Mr. Bell stated the other day, talking about de Havilland:

We recognize it is not a viable long-term proposition for this company to be operated on the assumption of ongoing government assistance.

If that is not the assumption, can the minister tell us what the assumptions are?

Senator Austin: Thank you, Senator Roblin. The first question you raised was related to the production of the April 19 document. I have already explained to you that it was prepared for the purposes of cabinet consideration, and it was so noted. Therefore, I am unable to produce it because of the usual rules governing the Privy Council Office.

Your second question dealt with the matter of disclosure and accountability. Since the assumption of my responsibilities I have maintained that CDIC, Canadair, de Havilland and Eldorado must meet the same standards, or even superior standards, as those required of companies trading on the Toronto Stock Exchange and under the authority of the Ontario Securities Commission. That has been done since I took over responsibility for those crown corporations. Indeed, just today the CDIC issued its first annual report and separate annual reports for Canadair, de Havilland and Eldorado. Those reports are in the mail to honourable senators and members of the other place at this very moment. I am sure that Senator Roblin will want to consider the material before we continue to discuss de Havilland.

The concern which Senator Roblin has expressed about the fait accompli with respect to the financing of such programs as the Dash-8 is an appropriate concern, but I want to point out to honourable senators that I appeared before the Finance Committee of the other place on June 22, 1983 and made a disclosure at some length—which, I know, honourable senators think is my habit—with respect to de Havilland, and I laid out the parameters of the decision which the government would have to take with respect to the Dash-8. I think that I made the statement with patent clarity, and offered Michael Wilson, who was present at the committee hearing and was the representative of the official opposition on the de Havilland matter, the opportunity to consider the question on the basis of facts and to join in a non-partisan conclusion with respect to what should happen to de Havilland. I said that I would bring the report back without conclusion if the two opposition parties were agreeable to discussions on the basis of a non-partisan and trilateral conclusion. Mr. Wilson said that it was not the role of the opposition to behave in that fashion and that the government should take its responsibilities and make its recommendations. That is what has been done. I think that Senator Roblin knows—and I said it in this chamber in early April—that I intended to make such a statement in mid-April but, unfortunately, it was scooped by a story which appeared in the Globe and Mail on April 10, to which I responded in a press conference. That being said, I offered to Senator Doody, who is the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, that I would appear before that committee at a time to be arranged, and in the week following I suggested a specific time. Senator Doody told me that he was unable to get a quorum for that particular time, so I suggested that when he was ready to meet with me I would be delighted to appear and respond to honourable senators' questions on the de Havilland issue.

Finally, with respect to Mr. Bell's statement, I must say that that statement certainly is one to which I also aspire. I would also like to see de Havilland placed on a commercial basis so that it is capable of operating in its programs and in its profit centres without additional government financing for its ongoing programs. That would then mean that de Havilland was truly a commercially viable company and the government at that time would be in a position to direct CDIC to discharge its mandate to search for a private sector purchaser or joint venturer with the Government of Canada in de Havilland. As Senator Roblin will know, the de Havilland balance sheet is not in such a position that the federal government could responsibly seek any private investor support because, as yet, there is no demonstrable return on investment of private sector quality.

Senator Roblin: Going back to the question of disclosure in the past, I simply observe that up until the crisis point was reached and no further temporizing was possible, there was not a frank statement from anybody on the government side as to what we were getting into. One cannot really be blamed if one continues to inquire about the financial state of these organizations.

The main point I wanted my friend to comment on has to do with Mr. Bell's statement, because the minister has given us the motherhood line and I agree with him, and I hope that this sort of thing happens. I want to know what parameters we are dealing with here. Mr. Bell says that he recognizes that he cannot operate on the assumption of ongoing government assistance. According to the same statement, however, he is counting on it for another ten years, because that is the time element involved in the forecasts that are being made by the government. Is that correct? Are we going to sit for another ten years while Canadair, this company and perhaps others wallow in the financial mire, so to speak? What parameters have been given to Mr. Bell and what parameters has he given to these various operating companies? What are the parameters with respect to the time element and the dollar element? What are the limits to the government's toleration on these matters?

● (1430)

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin has raised questions that are appropriate for discussion in committee. I would be pleased to deal with them in some detail there. I will say, however, that the question of reaching commercial viability is one in which I am delighted he concurs. We have been very clear throughout the term of our responsibility—and I throughout the term of my responsibility—for de Havilland that the company will not reach commercial viability in its current product lines. Mr. Bell is aspiring to the day when he will no longer be dependent on government financing for de Havilland. That day, however, does not lie in the near future.

In the first comment of his last interjection, Senator Roblin spoke about my not making clear the condition of the Dash-8 program of de Havilland. I would be delighted, therefore, to provide to him the full statement which I made in the Finance Committee of the other place and circulated to all honourable senators at the same time. This statement was made on June 22, 1983, and I will bring it to his attention.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I remember that statement well and I remember equally well that it did not meet anybody's definition of "timely." It was bolting the door long after that horse had left. I think that is the gravamen of my charge with respect to disclosure. We just did not get a timely disclosure at all, and I think that my honourable friend, in his more candid moments, will agree that that is so.

I think that I would like to save for the committee the minister's explanation of the $155,000 bonuses that were handed out to employees of de Havilland. I would also like to save for the committee a discussion of the wage concessions which apparently will have to be expected from the other workers at de Havilland. I will also tell the minister that I would be interested in knowing whether the forecasts of a one-third reduction in staff—namely, 1,000 people—by 1988 are accurate. I put those questions on the record so that the minister can get an idea of what I am really after.

I have a certain sympathy for my honourable friend, however. I see, in the Maclean's magazine that hit my desk today that with respect to de Havilland the minister is quoted as saying, "Customers don't want to buy political aircraft." I wonder whether he has communicated that statement to the Honourable Don Johnston, who seems to have made the de Havilland issue a political one in terms of the Liberal leadership race. I also wonder whether the minister would give me his opinion of the statement made by Mr. John Turner to the effect that, while we have lost $2,264 million so far in these two enterprises, he estimates that we are going to double that and we will have lost $5 billion before we get through. I suppose I would like to ask my honourable friend whether he endorses that statement.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, replying seriatim to Senator Roblin's various questions, the financial statements of de Havilland for the year-end December 31, 1983—which are, incidentally, the first statements issued by de Havilland since it became owned by the Government of Canada—showed that de Havilland's board of directors has paid a bonus of $155,000 to 12 key employees. That is an average of approximately $13,000 per employee. Under the commercial practices which are widespread in the manufacturing industry, a merit system is used which provides two levels of compensation. One is a base pay, and the other is a merit incentive bonus which is paid in various amounts and at various times under the direction of the board of directors. That system has been in place in de Havilland for many years and was inherited from the private-sector owners. The board of directors, in its discretion, made those awards for the business year ending May 31, 1983.

I should like to say to honourable senators that no further bonus payments have been made to employees of de Havilland nor are they intended to be made until there is a substantial turnaround in a favourable direction in the business circumstances of de Havilland. However, honourable senators should be reminded that for the period in which that bonus was paid, de Havilland was developing the Dash-8, and its financial performance as well as its marketing performance urgently required that the Dash-8 be delivered on time, on budget and according to specifications. The bonus was a decision of the board of directors of de Havilland to help achieve those objectives. I can report to honourable senators that the Dash-8 has been delivered one month ahead of time, on budget and exceeding the specifications required in terms of its performance. That is the bonus story.

I would only add—and I believe most honourable senators will agree—that if de Havilland is to be successful, it must be managed by a board of directors with commercial experience, on commercial practices and with commercial objectives, and it is not appropriate, where that company is being operated according to the criteria set forth by the shareholder, that any minister responsible intervene in questions of management.

In his second question, Senator Roblin referred to a statement made by me, which apparently appears in Maclean's, and I tend to want to own it although I have not read the story. The statement was that customers of de Havilland do not want to buy political aircraft. I believe this goes to the heart of the turnaround for de Havilland and for Canadair. Our customers do not want to be called before parliamentary committees and questioned as to why they purchased one of our products, what the terms were, why they did not take some other product, what their internal financing arrangements might be, and so on. Our customers just want to buy commercial aircraft at a commercial price, and it is not serving the interests of the people of Canada, in the stewardship which the government holds in the commercial success of de Havilland or, indeed, of Canadair, that unnecessary political controversy should continue with respect to both of these companies.

Indeed, the Globe and Mail of Friday, May 4, carried a story attributed to Premier Davis of Ontario in which he is said to have cautioned the Ontario federal Conservative caucus not to injure de Havilland inasmuch as it is one of the leading industrial activities in the province of Ontario. I certainly hope that the Conservative caucus will take those remarks to heart.

Finally, I do not seek to pursue the political rabbits set on the Liberal leadership field by any of the Liberal candidates for the leadership of my party, so I respectfully decline to answer that part of Senator Roblin's question.

● (1440)

At another time I would be happy to deal with the merits of any issues that may arise on these questions but I decline to respond to questions where a position or an argument is attributed to a Liberal leadership candidate.

Senator Roblin: I would like to remind my honourable friend that this morning's paper gave information in connection with the extent of the Freedom of Information Act as it applies to people who do business with the government. Unless there are compelling reasons, these people will now be exposed to public scrutiny as to what that business connection is, and I am afraid my honourable friend will have to face that question with respect to the politicizing of these two aircraft companies.

With respect to the future, what the Conservative Party is requesting, as far as I understand the matter, is that there should be a full investigation and inquiry into the future of these two institutions. That is also the thrust of what I am attempting to get from the minister now. I think it would be highly desirable if this matter were clarified and put to rest. In that respect I am sure a Senate committee, with its impartiality, might be able to give my honourable friend some good advice.

However, I want to get back to the statements that are being made with respect to prospective losses of these two companies. Mr. Turner has furnished the information that the loss is liable to be $5 billion, which is double what the companies have lost so far. Surely that kind of statement cannot be allowed to go uncorrected, if it is wrong. If someone in the opposition made that statement, my honourable friend would consider it his duty to correct it, to tell that person he was wrong and give an idea of the right figure. The same reasoning applies to the present situation. I think the minister should exercise his responsibility and put the record straight if he disagrees with the figure that has been stated.

Senator Austin: On the question of freedom of information, which is a new question you are raising, Senator Roblin, I too saw the press account and I agree that it raises some very interesting questions of public policy for consideration by the government and by Parliament. In the same vein, I would like to refer to an article which appears in Policy Options for May, which is written by a Professor Roderick White, with whom I am not acquainted. This article is a real contribution to the examination of the question of the clash in accountability system, with respect to crown corporations, the first being their corporate accountability within the necessary environment of their commerciality, and the second being their accountability to Parliament in the manner in which Parliament seeks accountability. I certainly have experienced the disfunctioning of these two processes, and I will have copies of this article made and circulated to honourable senators in order that they can consider the conceptual difficulties to which Senator Roblin has alluded.

With respect to the request by the Leader of the Opposition in the other place for a full investigation and inquiry into these two companies, which Senator Roblin referred to a few moments ago without attribution, I want to be very clear that there has been full accountability and exposure of the financial and business circumstances of the affairs of Canadair and de Havilland. On a number of occasions I have met with committees in this and the other place and I am prepared to meet again with the National Finance Committee here and with the Finance Committee in the other place on matters related to de Havilland or to Canadair. I must reiterate that I have not been reluctant to do so; in fact, I have been delighted to be invited, because the more opportunity I have to inform Parliament regarding the circumstances of these companies and the commitment of the government to the aerospace industry and to the employees of these companies, as well as to the development of Canadian technology, the happier I am. However, I think it would be deleterious in the extreme to have a full political investigation and inquiry of these two companies, an inquiry that would undoubtedly continue for some period of time. The reason I say it would be deleterious is that our customers would close their interest in our order book.

Senator Roblin has referred to the article in Macleans. The principal point I was attempting to make in that article is that so long as these companies are the subject of these political inquiries, our customers simply do not want to buy, and anyone here can understand why. Therefore, we must have a conclusion of the political process relating to Canadair and de Havilland. We must be able to give our customers assurance that what they buy is a commercial product from a company with commercial viability, a company to which the shareholder has a commitment for the on-going life-cycle of the product they are purchasing. Those are the assurances I have tried to give to both the domestic and the international communities in the case of Canadair and of de Havilland. The result has been an increased interest in the products of both companies. An inquiry of a political nature would simply totally offset the marketing efforts of these two companies and, frankly, in my view, destroy the companies. Therefore I will resist that particular concept of yet another inquiry.

At the same time I assure honourable senators that I am prepared to appear before committees to answer with respect to the affairs of these two companies. I do ask, however, that in the interests of the commercial stewardship which the government has for the success of those companies, that the inquiries not be unnecessarily prolonged.

Senator Roblin: The problem, of course, is that the minister has not established confidence either in the marketplace for aeroplanes or the marketplace for ideas. He has not established confidence in the situation that these two companies face, and until that is done—and the sooner the better—they will find themselves unable to deal in the commercial market in the way in which they desire.

His own cabinet colleague, the Honourable Donald Johnston, and the putative next leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. John Turner—

Senator Austin: I am sorry, what was that word?

Senator Roblin: "Putative": Puto, meaning, "I think." Do you remember that one?

Senator Austin: Yes.

Senator Roblin: The ball is in their court these days; we are running around after them. They are the people who are politicizing this situation. Why? Because there is no confidence in this situation as it appears at the moment. If my honourable friend wishes to establish confidence, he cannot achieve it unless he does some of the things that his critics are asking him to do, not only in my party but elsewhere.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I must contribute a little more to this fascinating debate. Confidence, Senator Roblin, will be measured by the order book. Confidence is returning because we are working very aggressively in both companies with interested customers, and that is the real test of confidence in these products. Political views, whether expressed by the opposition or by candidates for the leadership of my party, must be understood in their particular context.

[Senator Austin.]

Senator Roblin: I get the picture: It is all right for them to criticize, but not for us.

Senator Austin: I have put them together. I am saying that I do not welcome the continuation of the political process as it affects these two companies, whether from the opposition or from others in my party. However, I have no desire to engage in direct dialogue in the leadership race which is now under way in my party, and I am sure Senator Roblin and all other senators will understand why that is so.

In any event, perhaps I can conclude by saying that Senator Roblin has raised questions of interest, and I will be happy to consider them and indicate a time when I would be ready to stand and reply further in this chamber. At that time we can continue our debate and, hopefully, reach a conclusion in the spirit I outlined a few moments ago with respect to the commercial interests of these companies. Alternatively, I would come one more time before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and we could have these questions and answers debated in that forum.

● (1450)

Senator Roblin: Bring Mr. Turner with you, because when he wins the leadership you will have to change your tune.

Senator Austin: Senator Roblin, I hope you will take Premier Davis' injunction with respect to de Havilland quite seriously. He certainly knows that this debate continues at great commercial cost to Ontario.

Senator Roblin: He can tell Mr. Turner about that, too.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION

POSSIBLE REINTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Martial Asselin: My question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last week, to their surprise, Quebecers heard Mr. Turner, one of the candidates for the Liberal Party leadership, say in Quebec City that if he became Leader of the Liberal Party and at the same time Prime Minister, he would reformulate a new Bill S-31 that would be tabled in Parliament. We already knew that, a week before, Mr. Turner had agreed to maintain his directorship of Canadian Pacific.

We were also aware that Mr. Burbidge, the President of the company, testified before the Senate Committee, stating quite openly that on behalf of Canadian Pacific he had asked the Prime Minister to introduce a Bill that would block investments by the Caisse de dépôt du Québec, under Bill S-31.

Since many people in Quebec realize that Mr. Turner has a conflict of interest when he says that sort of thing while he is still a Director of Canadian Pacific, do the authorities in charge of the Liberal Party convention intend to ask Mr. Turner to at least have the decency to resign his directorship with Canadian Pacific?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the request in the honourable senator's question is completely out of order, as he knows better than I. I suppose he can ask the question if he so wishes. However, the honourable senator knows that members of the government are required to give a reply with respect to matters of government policy only. Mr. Turner is not a member of the government. Therefore, Mr. Turner can say whatever he chooses to say for whatever reasons he may have.

The other part of the honourable senator's question is not applicable in any way, shape or form in terms of the usual rules which apply to Question Period.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I realize the question is an embarrassing one for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and for cabinet members.

Has cabinet considered this question, since Mr. Turner wants to become Leader of the Liberal Party and Prime Minister of Canada? Did cabinet at least consider the possibility of advising him to resign his directorship with Canadian Pacific, before speaking out on reformulating Bill S-31?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is crystal clear to me that it is not embarrassing at all. Mr. Turner is not a member of the cabinet and that is clear.

Senator Asselin: He is a member of your party; he is running for the leadership of it—he wants to get the job!

Senator Olson: We do not have a conflict. I feel that the usual rules and precedents, which the honourable senator well knows, must be applied to Question Period. I know he understands this far better than he is letting on at the moment.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Is the Leader of the Government, with Mr. Turner, in favour of reformulating a new version of Bill S-31, to be introduced at the next session of Parliament?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is another question. There is a very important difference which the honourable senator has just brought up now in his question. He is now asking whether or not the government is in favour of a reintroduction in some similar or different form. I would refer that question to the minister responsible.

With respect to whether or not ministers in the government agree with press speculation, I would suggest that the honourable senator research the citations wherein he will find that a minister is not required, is not expected and, indeed, is prohibited from answering press speculation.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have another question. I do not suppose it will come as a surprise to the Leader of the Government, but I can say that not only Mr. Turner but also Mr. Chrétien, and other ministers who are seeking the leadership of the Liberal Party and who are also members of cabinet, have made statements similar to the one made by the Liberal Government, namely, that they intend to revive Bill S-31. Am I right or not?

[English]

Senator Olson: Of course, all of them take responsibility for their statements.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SOVIET UNION BOYCOTT

Hon. Martial Asselin: In another area, we were most disappointed to learn that the USSR would not attend the Los Angeles Games. All of a sudden we saw the Honourable Mr. Olivier seemingly offering his services as mediator between the Russians and the Americans.

That has not been looked at seriously by all. Was the matter discussed? Is it true that Mr. Olivier wants to act as a mediator between the Russians and the Americans, and if so, how does he plan to go about it?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to make an inquiry of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport with respect to that question. I am unaware that he was made an offer or, indeed, whether an offer has been accepted by him.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Could the Leader of the Government also direct the question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs since, in my opinion, he and his department are the ones who would be in a position to contact the Soviet and the American authorities to try and settle the conflict, not Mr. Olivier, the Minister of State responsible for Fitness and Amateur Sport? This cannot be serious!

[English]

Senator Olson: I will look at the honourable senator's second suggestion as well.

THE SENATE

MR. PIERRE DULUDE—EXPRESSION OF APPRECIATION FOR SERVICE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, as of today we will be losing the services of Pierre Dulude, one of our pages, who has been with us for a number of years. I would like to take this opportunity to remind honourable senators of his very valuable service to us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 22, 1984, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 22, 1984

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF THE LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Olson, is detained in the west on family business and will not be here tonight and he may not be here for the rest of the week. Senator Argue is here. I have no information with respect to Senator Austin.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—QUORUM—COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons:

HOUSE OF COMMONS
CANADA

Wednesday, May 16, 1984

Ordered—That the quorum of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Official Languages Policy and Programs be six members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses, the government and the opposition are represented, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when four members are present so long as both Houses, the government and the opposition are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that that House do unite with this House for the above purpose.

ATTEST

C. B. KOESTER
The Clerk of the House of Commons

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the message be taken into consideration?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move that the message be taken into consideration later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SECRETARY OF STATE VOTE 10a REFERRED TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons:

HOUSE OF COMMONS
CANADA

Thursday, May 17, 1984

Ordered—That the Secretary of State Vote 10a for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985, be referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs;

And that a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours of the aforementioned reference to the said Standing Joint Committee.

ATTEST

C. B. KOESTER
The Clerk of the House of Commons
COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT
BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-4, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "A", p. 571)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration on May 30 next.

Motion agreed to.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ADDRESSES AT INSTALLATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the Address of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, P.C., at the Installation of the Right Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, P.C., as Governor General of Canada on May 14, 1984, together with the reply of Her Excellency the Governor General thereto, be printed as an Appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this House.

Motion agreed to.

(For text of addresses see Appendix "B", p. 573)

THE ESTIMATES 1984-85

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1985, with the exception of the expenditures pertaining to the Official Languages Program.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there are two points for elaboration. First, honourable senators may or may not have noticed that, when documents were tabled earlier this evening, supplementary estimates (A) were included. It has been our practice for many years to refer those supplementary estimates immediately to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Secondly, there is an exception on this occasion. The estimates that are contained in supplementary estimates (A) that refer to the Secretary of State, particularly to the Official Languages Program, were referred in the other place to the Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs. Therefore, to conform with that reference, I will move in a moment that the supplementary estimates (A) which deal with that particular item be referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)—EXPENDITURES OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES PROGRAM REFERRED TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs be authorized to examine the expenditures pertaining to the Official Languages Program set out in the Supplementary Estimates (A), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, concerning the reference to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs, this is a part of the Estimates that the Committee on National Finance will not be examining. I was therefore wondering whether we should incorporate the report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages in ours, or whether it will submit its own report and the Committee on National Finance will be examining all other problems relating to Supplementary Estimates (A).

I find it difficult to accept this dual referral. I thought it was customary to have all referrals made to the Committee on National Finance. I am, however, prepared to accept this motion if honourable senators feel it is more appropriate to proceed in this fashion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in my experience this is the first time we have made arrangements to divide responsibility when making referrals on expenditures. Perhaps other, more experienced senators may wish to comment, but in any case, this is what was done in the other place, and perhaps we could experiment and leave it up to the two Speakers to decide how we should proceed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this was done previously with the Estimates for Veterans Affairs which were referred to a special committee.

Senator Frith: So there is a precedent. In my experience, an exception was made first of all with respect to the expenditures of the Department of the Secretary of State, but I believe the two co-chairmen of these committees, Senator Murray and Senator Doody, can make the necessary arrangements for submitting the reports and thus remove Senator Leblanc's cause for concern.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the motion does not authorize the Committee on National Finance to consider that part of the Estimates. So there is no problem there.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn is right. It is not the first time an exception of this kind has been made.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

Hon. William C. Doody: Honourable senators, I can only assume from the references that we have heard that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance can study the matters that have been referred to it. Since that committee has not had referred to it matters that are under the jurisdiction of Senator Murray, those matters are not the business of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance as of this moment. If, later on, the Senate decides to subdivide jurisdiction in this area, then so be it. Our committee simply studies those matters which are referred to it.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, surely the over-riding consideration is not whether there is a precedent for this. If it makes eminently good sense, we should adopt it.

Senator Frith: That is a very worthwhile ideal, in any case. Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—QUORUM

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons for the following purpose:

That the quorum of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Official Languages Policy and Programs be six members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses, the government and the opposition are represented, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when four members are present so long as both Houses, the government and the opposition are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, before we agree on this, I would like to ask why the quorum is set at six in the case of this committee. For all Senate committees the quorum is four. In the case of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments the quorum is also four. Why do we need six for this particular committee?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I shall ask Senator Murray, the seconder of the motion and the joint chairman of the Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs, to make any comments he wishes on that matter. As far as I am aware, the decision was made by that committee. I have no higher or more idealistic justification for it than that.

● (2020)

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have no responsibility in this matter except as seconder of Senator Frith's motion. I was the co-chairman of the special joint committee, as honourable senators know. As to the chairmanship of the new standing committee, it remains to be seen what honourable senators and members of the House of Commons will decide tomorrow at the organizational meeting of the committee.

The quorum of six follows from the requirement that there must be representatives of both houses, and also of the government and the opposition. It is probably for that reason that the President of the Privy Council decided to suggest that the quorum should be somewhat larger than is normally the case.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, would it be in order for the joint chairmen of the committee—

Senator Murray: There is no chairman.

Senator Riley: There is no chairman yet? Then I will ask the Deputy Leader of the Government when are we going to have a meeting of this joint committee, even for organizational purposes? So far, all that I have received are several notices followed the next day by a cancellation. Is there some reason for that?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, according to present plans, the meeting will take place at 3.30 p.m. tomorrow.

Senator Godfrey: Is it true that the President of the Privy Council decides what the quorum should be for joint committees?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He decides many other things, more serious than that.

Senator Murray: The motion would have been made in the other place on the initiative of the President of the Privy Council. I presume that the quorum of six, allowing for representation of both houses, and of the government and the opposition, was to ensure that the government would have a majority.

Senator Riley: Will the Deputy Leader of the Government confirm that the meeting will take place tomorrow? Is it confirmed?

Senator Frith: My information is that it has been confirmed.

Senator Riley: Why do we have to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government when there is no notice?

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable Senators, I wonder how estimates can be referred to a joint committee which has not even been struck. That is where I have problems—

Senator Flynn: It is too late.

Senator Leblanc: It has not even been struck!

Senator Frith: It has already been decided.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO SIT DURING SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

OLYMPIC GAMES

SOVIET UNION BOYCOTT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to direct my question to the Acting Leader of the Government. Before we adjourned for a few days, I had asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate to enquire from Hon. Jacques Olivier, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, about his offer to act as a mediator between the United States and the U.S.S.R. concerning the participation of Soviet athletes in the Summer Olympic Games which will take place in Los Angeles.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate had taken note of my question, indicating that he would reply to me at a later date. Is the Acting Leader or one of his assistants in a position to report progress concerning Mr. Jacques Olivier's possible mediation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): No and no!

CANADA POST CORPORATION

MAIL DELIVERY

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Gigantès on March 15, 1984 concerning mail delivery by the Canada Post Corporation.

Canada Post handles approximately 25 million pieces of mail every day. It is therefore inevitable that some delays might occur, especially with letters not bearing a postal code.

However, one of the corporation's priorities consists of improving its service, and tests show that on-time delivery performance on letter mail is up significantly from 74 per cent in 1981 to a plateau of around 90 per cent in recent months.

I can only add that I was pleased to receive two letters mailed in Toronto last week with only two days' delay.

ENGAGEMENT IN COMMERCIAL UNDERTAKING

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Guay on March 15, 1984 concerning commercial ventures by the Canada Post Corporation. It consists of five or six paragraphs, and I would be pleased to read it, or may I have it taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The three main objectives Parliament assigned to Canada Post Corporation are:

- improvement of postal service;
- harmonization of labour relations;
- financial self-sufficiency.

The Canada Post Corporation Act directs the corporation to become financially independent. But even more significantly, it repeatedly reminds the corporation of its responsibility to keep abreast of changing times and provide products and services adapted to the needs of the Canadian people.

The assigned mission is, and I quote: "... to operate a postal service for the collection, transmission and delivery of messages, information, funds and goods ..." and does not restrict the corporation to static, anachronistic methods. There can be no doubt that these services are expected to evolve to meet the changing needs of Canadian mail users.

The services being tested with Consumers Distributing and its customers are nothing more than "mail order" being brought into the 21st century. Consumers Distributing recognized that the Post Office has always been a major advertising medium and has always processed direct mail orders, handled cash and delivered parcels. By streamlining some procedures, Canada Post was able to tailor a range of services to meet the needs of Consumers Distributing while at the same time gaining some new revenues.

Contrary to the honourable senator's claims, Canada Post Corporation has not entered the retailing business. It does not buy, own or store merchandise, nor does it sell, warranty or install. In short, it does none of the things retailers normally do. It handles paper, funds and parcels, activities associated with the postal service for over two hundred years. To infer that Canada Post is now a retailer is to charge the banks with being in the telephone business because they process phone bills.

In closing, honourable senators, I simply wish to stress that if Canada Post Corporation does not pursue such opportunities, diminishing traditional mail volumes will force it to reduce its number of outlets and employment levels, which would have a serious negative impact on the economy of many small communities.

Canada Post would like to continue to serve the interests of the general public. To do so, however, it must grow with the times and change to meet its customers' needs. This is what the Consumers Distributing experiment is all about.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

NORTHEAST COAL DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Muir on April 17, 1984 concerning British Columbia's northeast coal development and government assistance thereto. Because of the length of the reply, I ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

How much public money has been expended to assist the northeast coal project both directly and indirectly insofar as roads, railways and ports are concerned?

In general terms, the overall project has an estimated cost of $2.8 billion, with generally half being provided by the private sector and half by the public sector. The public funds are approximately half provincial and half federal. It is important to note, however, that a significant portion of the public expenditures is being undertaken by Crown corporations with expected rates of return.

More particularly, the expenditures are as follows:

PRIVATE

- 2 mining companies, by the end of 1985 $1.2 billion
- private sources, for town site by 1986 $190 million
- tug boats $12 million

PUBLIC

- BC Rail, over the next four years $550 million
- CNR, attributable to northeast coal $380 million
- Ports Canada, terminal infrastructure $50 million
- BC/Federal Government, access road $9 million
- Ridley Terminals Inc., 90 per cent owned by Ports Canada, for coal terminal construction $250 million
- BC, for highways $92 million
- BC Hydro $33 million
- BC, for Tumbler Ridge town site $14 million
- Federal Government, for police station $1 million
- Federal Government, CMHC loans for town projects $40 million

How much employment is related to the Quintette development?

In the construction phase, the overall project has been estimated to generate 10,000-11,000 man-years of direct employment so far, and is expected to require a further 2,000- 3,000 man-years by 1985. A recent study by Marvin Schaeffer of the Canada West Association has estimated that the construction industry employment multiplier is 3.6 making the total employment of the overall project Canada-wide approximately 47,000 man-years.

In the operation phase, at full capacity, the Quintette project is expected to employ 1,500 persons and the Bullmoose project 490 persons; BC Rail will generate 50 direct new jobs, CNR will generate 95 new jobs; RTI is expected to employ 95 persons at full capacity. Overall the project is expected to employ approximately 2,230 directly and, using the 2.3 employment multiplier for the coal industry, the total new employment Canada-wide is estimated to be 5,100.

How much foreign exchange does Canada expect to realize annually from the sales of Quintette coal?

It is expected that by 1985 both the Quintette and Bullmoose mines will ship a total of 6.6 million tonnes per year of metallurgical coal which is currently selling at $95-$100 per tonne to net approximately $650 million in foreign exchange annually.

Sales of thermal coal, which are expected to be 1.3 million tonnes by 1986 and which currently sells at $50-$60 per tonne, should net a further $75 million in foreign exchange annually.

Enumerate any guarantees that Canada has received from the Japanese concerning minimum quantities and price in connection with coal purchases.

There were no formal legal guarantees to any Canadian governments, the guarantees were to the coal producers.

Would either minister indicate whether it is the government's view that these guarantees will be sufficient to keep the Quintette development in operation over the long term?

Despite the current softness of coal markets worldwide, the government is confident that the coal project will ultimately be profitable.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: What was the gross amount?

Senator Frith: The gross amount is $2.8 billion. It is important to note, however, that a significant portion of the public expenditures is being undertaken by crown corporations with expected rates of return. All that information is contained in the answer and I expect that Senator Hicks and Senator Murray will be very interested in that detail.

Hon. Robert Muir: As will Senator Muir.

Senator Frith: Did I say Senator Murray? Of course Senator Muir will also be interested in reading that detail.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION

POSSIBLE RE-INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): I have one further delayed answer. It is to a question asked by Senator Asselin on May 10, 1984 concerning the possible re-introduction of Bill S-31 during the next session of Parliament.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I was referring to Mr. Turner.

Senator Frith: I cannot answer for Mr. Turner; I can only answer for the government.

Honourable senators, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has stated that it is not the government's intention to bring such a measure back before Parliament.

Senator Asselin: Can you answer for Mr. Chrétien and the other aspiring leaders?

Senator Frith: I can only answer for the government, and I have done so.

THE HONOURABLE CHARLES McELMAN

FELICITATIONS ON AWARD OF HONORARY DOCTORATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to draw to your attention the fact that last week one of our colleagues, the Honourable Charles McElman, was awarded an Honorary Doctorate degree from the University of St. Thomas in New Brunswick.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE STANLEY CUP

FELICITATIONS TO EDMONTON OILERS

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, before orders of the day are called, I am sure you will allow me a moment to draw your attention to a very significant, important event which transpired in western Canada, in Alberta, in the city of Edmonton last Saturday night when the Edmonton Oilers returned to Canada the Stanley Cup.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hastings: Not only did they bring the Stanley Cup back to Canada but, for the first time, they brought it to western Canada. I am sure all honourable senators would wish me to extend congratulations and best wishes to the management and players of the Edmonton Oilers.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: I join in the universal commendation of the Edmonton Oilers Hockey Team for winning the Stanley Cup. However, I would like to point out that the Vancouver Millionaires won the National Hockey League Stanley Cup in 1918, and we shall win it again.

An Hon. Senator: You have had a long drought.

THE HONOURABLE JACK MARSHALL

INQUIRY AS TO INJURY

Hon. Joseph-Phillipe Guay: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Deputy Leader if he could enlighten us as to what happened to Senator Marshall today.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What happened to Senator Marshall?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What did happen?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Marshall has not provided me with any answers, delayed or otherwise, that I could bring forward to the Senate on his behalf.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lapointe, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-12, intituled: "An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977".—(Honourable Senator Kelly).

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C-12. I might explain briefly why I am speaking to Bill C-12. As you know, this is only the second time I have spoken in this chamber in the year and a quarter I have been here. I mentioned during my maiden speech over a year ago how intimidating I found this chamber, but I felt that time would change that. I might say it has not, but in the intervening period I have had a new intimidation in the person of my leader, who indicated that I was to speak on Bill C-12! So I had a choice—which did I fear more? Obviously, I feared my leader more than the chamber.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Which leader, Senator Flynn or Mr. Davis?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Fight fair.

Senator Kelly: I have but one leader.

Before I was appointed to the Senate I often wondered why most legislators in Canada were lawyers. I must confess that as an engineer I was somewhat irritated by the circumstance. However, in doing my research on Bill C-12 and on other bills such as Bill C-9, Bill C-24 and Bill C-25, I have come to understand that the complexity of the bill, to me at least, is daunting indeed. If one is not an expert in federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, which I am not, one would almost need a legal background in order to wade through and comprehend this bill. For example, I would like to refer to clause 5, which amends section 19(2), which should be the recipient of some kind of dubious award for circumlocution. I would like to quote from it:

(2) The entitlement in respect of the post-secondary education financing program applicable to a province for a fiscal year that begins after March 31, 1983 is the amount, as determined by the Minister, equal to the product obtained by multiplying

(a) the quotient obtained by dividing

(i) the federal contribution payable for that established program to all the provinces for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1975

by

(ii) the population of all the provinces for that fiscal year

by

(b) the product obtained by multiplying the population of the province for that fiscal year by the escalator determined pursuant to subsection 22(3) for each fiscal year in the period commencing on April 1, 1976 and ending on March 31 of that fiscal year.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): So far that is clear.

Senator Kelly: I was informed by officials of the Department of Finance that in statutes relating to federal-provincial arrangements absolute precision is of great importance in order to avoid misunderstandings later on. In being absolutely precise, the technicians, I am sure, are satisfied, but I suspect that everyone else is thoroughly confused. Certainly I am. For that reason I admire and am grateful for Senator Hicks' lucid explanation of the main points of Bill C-12.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Did he explain that clause in particular?

Senator Kelly: I read and reread that clause.

This evening I would like to focus on what I consider to be three significant and substantive issues raised by Bill C-12. In my opinion, the first two reflect the role of the Senate as the chamber of sober, second thought, and the third the role of the Senate as the guardian or preserver of regional or provincial rights and concerns.

Although the bill has been improved upon since first reading in the other place, I am still concerned that the method of funding it contemplates makes it difficult for parliamentarians to exercise their fiduciary duties in approving the expenditure of public money. I was gratified, once again, that Senator Hicks alluded to this in his remarks in moving reading.

The second issue is that Bill C-12, by reducing the cash transfers to post-secondary education is, in my opinion, wrong-headed. Means must be found to channel more, and not less, funding for post-secondary education.

The third issue is that Bill C-12 was conceived and prepared with woefully insufficient federal-provincial consultation and agreement.

Returning to the first point, Bill C-12 relates to the mechanics by which the federal government transfers funds to the provinces. As you know, honourable senators, education and health care—the two matters covered by Bill C-12—fall within provincial jurisdiction. Health care has already been the subject of considerable attention and debate during the consideration of Bill C-3, the Canada Health Care Act. Tonight I should like to concentrate on post-secondary education.

[Senator Frith.]

The federal government's involvement in post-secondary education began after World War II and continued in the aftermath of the Korean War in order to assist veterans of the Canadian Armed Forces in gaining access to and obtaining post-secondary education.

Federal involvement continued in order to help assure equal access of Canadians to post-secondary education of a universally high standard. Until 1977, the federal government's assistance to post-secondary education was funded through a system of conditional cost-sharing arrangements. This system of cost-sharing arrangements allowed the federal Parliament to scrutinize and control the expenditure of public money for which it was responsible. After 1977, largely at the urging of the provinces, we moved to a system of unconditional block grants that were, in effect, trusts. The provinces no longer needed to submit information about their expenditures to the federal government. I, for one, do not question the integrity of the provinces. I also note that the Economic Council of Canada in its study "Financing Confederation Today and Tomorrow" found that, and I quote:

—Provinces have not taken undue advantage of the increased flexibility of established programs financing to reduce their spending on health, higher education and related programs.

Having said that, I still wonder how parliamentarians can exercise full fiduciary duty to the taxpayers of Canada by approving block-funding arrangements which provide no information on how the funding is used by another level of government. This was addressed by Senator Hicks when he pointed out that perhaps the addition of clause 9 to Bill C-12 took care of that objection. However, as the honourable senator also noted, Bill C-12 and clause 9 are effective for only two financial years. What happens in 1985-86? Will the rules then change again? Is post-secondary education to be left to whim? How in the world can the provinces engage in long-term planning under those circumstances? As you are aware, honourable senators, we are discussing more than dollars and accountability for these moneys; we are talking about one of the most valuable and significant investments a country can make—education of its youth.

● (2040)

Since graduation from university some time ago, I have maintained an involvement and interest in post-secondary education. I served for a time as Chairman of the Board of Governors of Ryerson Polytechnic, which I consider to be a fine college in my city of Toronto. My second point of concern with respect to C-12 springs from this interest. To sum it up in a sentence, I repeat, we must find ways to channel more—not less—funding to post-secondary education.

In Canada we now have 1.5 million unemployed, which constitutes a $50 billion loss to the economy each year. Some 540,000 of these unemployed are young Canadians—in their prime and unemployed. During the great depression we often heard of the lost generation. These 540,000 unemployed young people constitute our lost generation. Some 55,000 of these young unemployed Canadians—more than 10 per cent of all unemployed youth—are found in my resident city of Toronto. For a large portion of these unemployed, enthusiasm is all they have to offer. They desperately need training to upgrade their skills. Others suffer from poor skill fits—the economy is unable to absorb the skills they have; or, even worse, the evolution of the economy has rendered many of their skills obsolete.

If we are to believe the economists and commentators such as John Naisbitt in Mega trends, the situation could well get worse before getting better. Our new information/high technology economy demands immediate and continuous retraining if Canada is to remain internationally competitive and if it is to obtain a high and stable level of employment. Yet, while major structural adjustments are occurring in the economy, according to the Canadian Association of University Teachers and the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada, our post-secondary institutions are approaching a state of crisis.

In Ontario, I am aware that the government has been forced by restraints to cut back expenditures on post-secondary education and to limit enrolment. Therefore, I am somewhat alarmed by the federal government's decision, through Bill C-12, to tie its block funding of post-secondary education to its six-and-five program. I believe that post-secondary education is so vital to our economic recovery and growth that it must be exempted from the six-and-five program. We must find ways of channelling more—not less—funding to post-secondary education.

Perhaps because of the chronic deficit position of most of our governments we will have to look elsewhere for contributions. I understand that roughly 73 per cent of education costs in Canada are borne by governments. Perhaps we should be looking at ways to restructure our tax system to attract capital from private individuals and corporations to our post-secondary institutions.

The private sector, better than any, recognizes that it needs the skills and the discoveries produced in our post-secondary institutions. It should be able to contribute financially to Canada's greatest investment program—post-secondary education. I want to stress, however, that government support must, and will, be an integral element of total support.

My third point is an objection to the unilateral method by which the federal government prepared Bill C-12. This bill may well represent the lowest point in federal-provincial relations and, in my opinion, demands the attention of this chamber.

I know that in Ontario Bill C-12 is viewed as a full and final repudiation by the federal government of a major federal-provincial agreement reached only seven years ago. The Ontario treasurer sees Bill C-12 as only one link in a chain of federal retrenchment.

In the early 1970s the federal government imposed a 15 per cent growth limit on its post-secondary education contributions. In 1972, provinces had to absorb significant losses associated with the termination of the revenue guarantee.

Through Bill C-12 the federal government is introducing—no, imposing once again—arbitrary ceilings and ending long-term financial certainty to the provinces. Through Bill C-12 it unilaterally—and I stress the word “unilaterally”—changes the funding arrangements for health care and post-secondary education which have been in place since 1977. What does this do to long range, sound fiscal planning? Again, I look to my home province of Ontario as one example. Ontario will have to accommodate up to $43 million in lost revenue in 1983-84 and $92 million in 1984-85.

In their April, 1983 statement provincial treasurers argued that the proportions imposed by Bill C-12 have little relevance to actual expenditures today. Bill C-12 splits established programs funding on the basis of spending ratios in 1975-76. I believe that is the gist of clause 5 as it amends section 19(2). Bill C-12 arbitrarily assigns about two-thirds to health and one-third to post-secondary education.

It should come as no surprise that the aggregate provincial spending pattern has changed greatly since 1975. Today, about three-quarters of the total spending under this funding occurs in health and one-quarter in post-secondary education. All of this has occurred with no meaningful dialogue between the federal and provincial governments—no compromises and no assurances.

Honourable senators, the Secretary of State has informed provinces that he is not prepared to guarantee a continuation of unconditional funding beyond next year. Thus, virtually everything is being left up in the air as far as the provinces and the post-secondary education community are concerned. This greatly undermines the ability to plan for the long term and leaves both provinces and universities under the threat of even more federal cuts in the future. Moreover, if Bill C-12 signals structural changes in the way Ottawa funds post-secondary education, starting in 1985, then, potentially, we will have on our hands a serious federal-provincial confrontation over jurisdictional responsibility. Such is the uncertainty that this bill creates.

We must look more closely at Bill C-12, honourable senators. I would feel far more comfortable with Bill C-12 if program design extended further in time to provide better opportunities for long range planning on the part of the provinces; and, if Bill C-12 contemplated additional funding by governments but opened the way for private sector contributions to post-secondary education. Finally, I would feel better if Bill C-12 had resulted from truly effective federal-provincial consultation and was supported—not opposed—by the provinces.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I believe that Bill C-12 provides this chamber with an interesting opportunity for those of us here to display the view we have of ourselves insofar as our responsibilities are concerned. The Senate has been viewed from time to time, among other things, as a chamber of sober, second thought. Having observed votes in this chamber for over a year now, I am persuaded that the government side is committed as a group, by and large, to support, without alteration, government bills which arrive here from the other place. So much for sober, second thinking as far as the government side of the Senate is concerned!

However, there is another role which has been much discussed, particularly recently, that is, the role of senators as representatives of their regions. Having listened to many speakers from both sides of this chamber during discussions on Senate reform, I am persuaded there is considerable support on the part of the majority of senators for this role—the role of regional representation. Therefore, insofar as Bill C-12 is concerned, I suggest that this chamber has an opportunity to demonstrate its commitment to regional representation.

To my knowledge there is not a single province which supports Bill C-12 in its present form. There is not a single province that feels there was sufficient consultation by the federal government with the provinces. In my view at least, there is not one among us who can, in conscience, do other than vote against Bill C-12, returning it to the other place for further study and for more meaningful consultation with provincial administrations.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I would like to put a question to Senator Kelly. I have listened with great attention to his speech and I appreciate his comments very much. How would the honourable senator react to a suggestion of a return to the 50-50 formula which was in place prior to 1977?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, before I consider what my answer to the honourable senator's question would be, I would like to see that question asked at a meaningful discussion between the federal and provincial levels of government. I do not think that what I particularly believe with respect to that point is nearly as significant as it is to have the provinces given an opportunity to view that as an option if, indeed, it is.

● (2050)

Senator Thériault: I understand the honourable senator's position, which is that he does not want to take a position. However, on the question of regional representation—which I would prefer to call provincial representation—does he feel that our role as the Senate, a second chamber, is to defend, protect and advance the role of provincial governments or not?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Sure.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Not provinces; governments.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I have posed my question to Senator Kelly, but it appears that Senator Asselin wishes to discuss the matter.

Senator Asselin: You may want to adjourn the debate.

Senator Thériault: If Senator Asselin wants to make a speech, I shall certainly listen.

Senator Asselin: No, I do not want to make a speech.

Senator Thériault: Why does Senator Asselin not listen to his colleague?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I believe I am being asked for my particular view. When I refer to the commitment to regional representation, I am describing what I sense to be the consensus here, that that is a legitimate and logical role for the Senate.

My personal view is that, frankly, I am attracted to the chamber of sober, second thought where there are no clear ties to a particular region or to a particular political point of view. There is an honest effort to give our best judgment, as individuals, on the problems of the day and come through with whatever consensus we can arrive at here and not vote as a block one or a block two, or, by the same token, carry a message from province one or province two.

The consensus seems to be in the direction of convincing the people at large that this is and should be a chamber of regional representatives.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: If the honourable senator were to accept a question from me, I would draw his attention to my motion on the Order Paper, which has been there for two years. Senator Kelly suggests that this should be sent back to the House of Commons. My motion states:

That whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by the Committee of the Senate in which in the opinion of such Committee, a province or provinces have a special interest, then as a general policy, the government of such province or provinces where in the opinion of the Committee it is practicable to do so, shall be asked by the Committee as to whether or not they wish to make written and/or verbal representations to the Committee, and any province that replies in the affirmative shall be given a reasonable opportunity to do so.

Does Senator Kelly not believe that to be a reasonable procedure, that is, that rather than sending this bill back to the House of Commons it be referred to a committee and then the provinces can appear before the committee? The committee can then suggest proper amendments to the bill after hearing what the provinces have to say. Would this not be better than just dumping the bill back to the House of Commons? I would like the honourable senator's comments as to why he would not follow this procedure.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I do not deny that that is a reasonable option. However, I do not know how that replaces meaningful and in-depth discussions between the government at the federal level and the various provincial governments. If I understand the honourable senator correctly, if the provinces feel that they still have something they want to raise, they should raise it before a Senate committee.

Senator Godfrey: In other words, if they should be denied reasonable discussion with the government, then, as a last resort, they could come to a Senate committee. When the provinces have been spurned by the government, we would listen to them and then make recommendations based upon that discussion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): When have we done that?

Senator Asselin: Change the Senate!

Senator Kelly: My concern, honourable senators, is about the make-up under the circumstances I perceive here. I hope I am wrong but if, as I described earlier, the commitment of the government side is to see to it that bills get through intact, then I am not sure that a Senate committee, dominated by members of that government side, would guarantee the kind of hearing to which I feel the provinces are entitled.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have been here somewhat longer than Senator Kelly, and I have found that committees of this house meet 95 per cent of the time in a non-partisan fashion.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Godfrey: Perhaps Senator Flynn only attends committees when he wants to be partisan and, therefore, he does not understand this. I think we do operate effectively in a non-partisan way. One of the most non-partisan members of a committee is, for example, Senator Nurgitz. He and I usually agree about everything. I do not see where Senator Kelly gets the impression that our committees are partisan.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): When did we last amend a government bill in committee?

Senator Godfrey: The last time that I recall was when Mr. Kaplan very strongly resisted the "gating" bill.

Senator Flynn: That was not a regional matter.

Senator Godfrey: Although he opposed our recommendations at the outset, in the end he accepted what we said, which was simply this: You do not have to amend it; you can discuss it in committee and convince the government that you are going to oppose it. Insist on an amendment and bring in the amendment yourselves. That is what happened.

On motion of Senator Tremblay, debate adjourned.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board) moved the second reading of Bill C-23, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move second reading of Bill C-23 which, in essence, is designed to double the amount of money that can be obtained by producers under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. I might say that this bill was dealt with in the House of Commons on Friday last in a very expeditious manner, all three parties not only supporting the bill but effecting its passage in almost record time. Therefore, the fact that it received unanimous approval or support by all parties in the House of Commons is recognition that it is a most welcome bill.

This legislation is now more than 25 years old and plays a very important role in the operation of the grain economy in western Canada. Sometimes people are asked the question: Why is there a need for cash advances when grain export sales have been breaking all previous records and when there have been tremendous movements of grain to export? The fact is, farmers will always be short of money in the fall because, even if our system is working at full efficiency, that, in itself, means the delivery and movement of grain will be spread over a 10- or 12-month period. It is impossible for farmers to sell all their grain, or even a large percentage of their grain, in the first month or two after the grain has been harvested. Therefore, for a period of time, farmers are long on grain and short on money. This program has been devised to allow farmers to receive some advances on the moneys that they will receive as they deliver their grain.

We have had in effect for some time now a maximum of $15,000, and it is felt by everyone that this amount should be increased. The cash advance works in the following way. After the grain producer in the prairies has harvested the grain, he or she can take the permit book to the local elevator manager and apply for a cash advance. The amount of the cash advance had been set out before that time by regulation. The farmer applying for the cash advance takes an oath that he has a certain quantity of grain on hand that he is prepared to market to the Canadian Wheat Board as soon as a quota becomes available. Therefore, as long as the farmer has the amount of grain that is set out in his affidavit and application form, and as long as he delivers that grain as the quotas become available, then his cash advance is discharged. If, for whatever reason, the farmer fails to deliver that grain, then he or she will fall into arrears.

I want to point out that, historically, the losses entailed by the government in this system due to non-payment of cash advances are in the order of one-tenth of one per cent. That is a great tribute to the ability and integrity of the prairie farmers and to a reasonable use of the system.

Honourable senators, even though this interest-free money is available to every producer who has a permit book, only 25 per cent of the farmers go to the elevator and avail themselves of the cash advances. Even when times are rough, only about 25 per cent do so. That seems rather odd. Why would they not all march into town and get this interest-free money? Well, I can tell honourable senators why, and I can give the reasons from experience.

A farmer will get the interest-free cash advance, and boy, he is really happy to have a wad of money for 24 or 48 hours. He can then go around to pay his bills, or whatever part of his bills that the cash advance will cover. Then, when the quota comes, lo and behold, he gets almost nothing by way of a cheque. He has spent all his money at once. I suppose that we appreciate receiving a cheque once a month or once every two weeks because it helps us to manage our business. If we were to receive on one day all of the money we had made over an entire year, some of us might have difficulties balancing our budgets. I suppose that that is part of the reason why only 25 per cent of the farmers avail themselves of these cash advances.

In any event, honourable senators, the cash advance is very important, not only to the producer who receives it, but also to the merchants of the local town—the fertilizer dealer, the farm implement dealer, the fuel merchant, the storekeeper and everyone else who has been helping to finance the farmer's operation by providing credit, during the summer, based on a cash advance that will be forthcoming.

Honourable senators, the question I had to ask myself was: By how much should the cash advance be increased? In the view of some people, it should have been doubled from $15,000 to $30,000. Others said that the cash advance should go as high as $50,000. My own attitude is that we should have in place a cash advance system that is at a level which takes care of the requirements based on the rule of the great majority of producers. Let us not, however, go so high as to cause the taxpayers of Canada to put up money to support a kind of elite in terms of the producers. I did not, therefore, go so far as some had requested. My recommendation was to double the amount of the cash advance. My colleagues agreed.

In reading the debate that went on in the House of Commons, I was very pleased by the fact that, unless I missed it, there was no criticism of the legislation based on the maximum ceiling that is set out. Nobody suggested that it should be higher.

Today, only 50 per cent of the grain producers of western Canada have sufficient acreage to qualify for the $15,000 maximum that is now in place. Only 19 per cent of the producers will have enough acreage and enough grain to reach the maximum to which they will be entitled under this legislation, namely, $30,000. That is because the vast majority of grain producers in western Canada is made up of the rather small or medium-sized farmer. There is a small percentage—one, two, three, four, or five, depending on the mathematics used to estimate it—of large producers. In my view, the $30,000 maximum is adequate at this time.

There is another provision of the bill that has been agreed to in the other place. I think it is a very good provision. If the government in the future decides that producers should have a higher cash advance, it will no longer be necessary to go before Parliament with a separate bill to bring that about. There is a provision whereby the increase can be included in an appropriations bill. This is a much simpler mechanism by which to make such a change, but it will enable honourable senators and members of the House of Commons to retain the authority to decide, in a legislative way, whether or not, at a given time, the amount of the cash advances should be increased.

The maximum limit specified in the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act for cash advances to individuals is currently $15,000. Corporations, partnerships or co-operatives involving two shareholders, partners or members can qualify for up to $30,000 and those involving three shareholders, partners or members can qualify for up to $45,000. These limits have been applicable since the legislation was last amended in 1975. Bill C-23 will amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act to increase these maximum limits to $30,000 for individuals, to $60,000 for multi-farm units having two participants, and to $90,000 where there are three or more participants.

Emergency advance payments may be invoked pursuant to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act for drying tough or damp grain, and the advance in that case is $1,500. This emergency provision would apply to a producer who, because of weather conditions, has been so unfortunate as not to be able to harvest his crop in the fall. As we used to say in the House of Commons, such grain was "under the snow." That is a rough way of saying it is unthreshed grain, and it could be unthreshed in the year in which it was seeded. This bill provides, for grain under the snow, a cash advance of $7,500. Under the present legislation, the $1,500 payment for drying tough grain is being doubled to $3,000, while the $7,500 payment for unthreshed grain is being doubled to $15,000.

There is a provision in the existing act that where a husband and wife have a joint permit book—whether the land be jointly owned or partially owned by either spouse—there is a ceiling on that permit book which confines the amount of the cash advance to that which a single permit book holder would receive. That provision is being removed, and, I think, wisely so. It not only recognizes that a woman in the business world should have rights equal to those of a man, which is a fundamental recognition, but it also recognizes that women are taking an ever larger role in the operation of grain farms in western Canada. I think that that is most welcome.

Honourable senators, these are the main features of the legislation that I am proposing tonight. Basically, this legislation will increase the cash flow. Producers, when they have been really strapped for funds, have obtained as much as $300 million in cash advances. Doubling the amount of the cash advances will not mean that, on the basis of past assumptions, that amount will increase to $600 million. As I have explained, the amount does not just automatically double but responds to the need to recognize that costs have gone up and that a larger cash flow must be provided to the producers of western Canada.

• (2110)

Some time ago, I announced the new initial prices for this year. Spring wheat and durum were reduced; feed barley and feed oats were increased, in relation to a year ago. Nonetheless, the net effect has been a moderate reduction in initial payments. I am fully convinced, with the knowledge I have of the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board, that there will be final payments on all of these commodities much in excess of the drop in the initial price. Therefore, at the worst, it is a postponement of income. With regard to spring wheat, it is a postponement of some 28 cents a bushel. For a farmer who has the grain, an additional $15,000 cash advance is equal to that reduction on 53,000 bushels of wheat. Perhaps that is not a comparison that would stand a logical examination. In any event, the farmer is postponing or forgoing a cash flow of 28 cents a bushel. Based on the difference between the 11 or 12 per cent that the Wheat Board gets when it invests that 28 cents in its own account and the 15 or whatever per cent that the farmer in debt must pay, it is, in the final analysis, a net cost of less than two cents a bushel.

I am very pleased that the House of Commons has scheduled for debate on Friday of this week amendments to the Western Grain Stabilization Act. In my opinion, that is one of the most imaginative and far-reaching amendments to have been proposed to any particular piece of legislation. It is the estimate of the authorities that if the market conditions and cost conditions do not improve or worsen, the western producers will receive payments in excess of $1 billion within the next three years. It is their money, in the sense that they have contributed to it; the government has also made its contribution. It is something that is coming to the producers. I feel that the government has made and is making a very adequate response to the needs of those producers.

This legislation in itself, coupled with the other action that has been taken in the grain business this year, in many ways is a response to the needs of the producers of western Canada. In each of the years that I have been the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, we have broken, by way of export, every previous record. It is not yet certain whether this year will again be a record-breaking year. Our total export of all of these grains will either be just a little more or a little less than last year. However, I will stick my neck out and be confident that, in this crop year, we will once again break every preceding record by having the greatest exports of these grains in the history of Canada.

While international prices are not as high as they should be, I was delighted to read that the Wheat Board asking price today is somewhat higher than it was a year ago. My greatest concern is that we get some rain on the prairies which will ensure production out there, because I think there will be a market for large quantities of grain at current prices. This legislation will help the grain producers, and I recommend it to my colleagues.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: May I ask a question of the honourable minister? I would like to be certain that I understood him when he said that the treatment of a spouse is exactly the same as the treatment of an enterprise with two persons.

Senator Argue: Yes, that is exactly right.

Senator Hicks: In other words, a husband and wife in a joint enterprise would be treated as two persons, and the maximum of $30,000 plus $30,000, that is to say, a total of $60,000 would apply?

Senator Argue: Yes, that is right. This legislation will correct an anomaly or penalty that existed in the previous legislation.

On motion of Senator Bielish, debate adjourned.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

FIFTH REPORT ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fifth Report of the Committee of Selection, which was presented on 10th May, 1984.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, the adoption of this report.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would Senator Petten refresh our memory as to the content of the report?

Senator Petten: That report contained a list of senators nominated by the Committee of Selection to serve on the Special Senate Committee on problems facing Canadian Youth.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2.00 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT
(Statutory Instruments No. 24)

In accordance with its permanent reference, Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Joint Committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses the Quebec Wood Order, 1983, registered as SOR/83-713.

Your Joint Committee reports that, in its judgment, the making of this Order is not authorized by Section 2 of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. A-7. While your Committee's conclusion was first reached in respect of various Orders <sup>(1)</sup> which have now been replaced by the Order under Report, it applies with equal force to the latter.

Section 2(1) of the enabling Statute is as follows:

"2. (1) The Governor in Council may by order grant authority to any board or agency authorized under the law of any province to exercise powers of regulation in relation to the marketing of any agricultural product locally within the province, to regulate the marketing of such agricultural product in inter-provincial and export trade and for such purposes to exercise all or any powers like the powers exercisable by such board or agency in relation to the marketing of such agricultural product locally within the province."

The provincial Farm Products Marketing Act, R.S.Q. c. M-35, makes provision for the regulation of the marketing of wood products in the Province of Quebec. The purpose of the Order under Report is to grant to the provincial marketing boards concerned powers to regulate the marketing of wood in inter-provincial and export trade similar to those they already exercise in relation to intro-provincial trade. Pursuant to Section 2 of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, however, the Governor in Council may only delegate such marketing powers to a provincial board in relation to an agricultural product and your Committee has taken the position that wood cannot be regarded as a product of agriculture.

Your Committee has considered the various definitions of "agriculture", "agricultural", "agricultural product", "farming operation" and "farming products" in the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, Jowitt's Dictionary of English Law and Black's Law Dictionary. None of these definitions supports the view that wood or wood products are agricultural products. Your Committee has also taken note of the definitions of "agricultural product" in the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. A-8, the Agricultural Products Board Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. A-5, and the Agricultural Products Cooperative Marketing Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. A-6; that of "agricultural commodity" in the Agricultural Stabilization Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. A-9; and finally, those of "farming" and "farm" in the Farm Credit Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-2, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-3, and the Farm Syndicates Credit Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-4. In none of these federal enactments are forestry products expressly treated as products of agriculture.

"The science and art of cultivating the soil; including the allied pursuits of gathering in the crops and rearing live stock; tillage, husbandry, farming".

Using this definition, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, in Re Penner and Town of Lumsden, (1980) 101 D.L.R. (3d) 115, held that the operation of a greenhouse as a principal use was not an "agricultural" use for zoning purposes. In Re Walker and Township of Uxbridge, (1981) 118 D.L.R. (3d) 690, the application before the Court was for an order declaring that a parcel of land described as a "tree farm" be valued for assessment purposes as "farm lands used only for farm purposes" pursuant to Section 27(3) of the Ontario Assessment Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 32. While Boland J. agreed that trees grown for timber are a crop, she decided that the word "farming" "cannot extend to a tree farm growing timber which will require decades to mature". This decision was upheld by the Ontario Divisional Court [(1984) 150 D.L.R. (3d) 767].

On the basis of the foregoing dictionary definitions, of the definitions which appear in other federal Statutes, many of which are in pari materia, and in light of relevant judicial decisions, your Committee is satisfied that the ordinary grammatical meaning of the expression "agricultural product" does not include wood and wood products and that, consequently, the Governor in Council does not have the power, pursuant to Section 2 of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act to grant to provincial marketing boards authority to regulate the inter-provincial and export trade in wood. Your Committee suggests that an extended definition of "agricultural product" that would include wood be added to the Act.

Informed of your Committee's position in this matter, the Minister of Agriculture replied that he was prepared to consider the advisability of amending the Act in the manner suggested by your Committee. In a letter dated October 12, 1983, the Joint Chairmen and Vice-Chairman of the Committee conveyed to the Minister the Committee's belief that "consideration of such an amendment should be a matter of high priority and the necessary amendment made in the course of this Parliament." In his reply, the Minister reiterated his previous assurance but indicated his intention to delay the introduction of such an amendment until the need for other amendments to the Act had been evaluated. Your Committee is glad of the Government's intention to seek proper legislative authority for the making of orders such as that under Report, but believes the introduction of the necessary amendment should not be made to wait on a general revision of the Act.

In making this report, your Committee's purpose is to impress upon the Government the need for speedy legislative action. In this connection, your Committee feels free to suggest that the necessary legislation might conveniently be introduced in the Senate. In our view, the number of legislative proposals that are regularly introduced in the House of Commons makes it eminently practical to introduce in the Upper Chamber minor legislative amendments of a technical nature that are non-controversial and do not involve the expenditure of public monies. The amendment to the Canada Agricultural Products Marketing Act which your Committee has recommended meets these criteria.

Therefore, your Committee recommends that the Government give consideration to the advisability of introducing the necessary legislation in the Senate without delay.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY
Joint Chairman

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ADDRESS BY THE PRIME MINISTER, THE RIGHT HONOURABLE PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU, P.C., AT THE INSTALLATION OF THE RIGHT HONOURABLE JEANNE SAUVÉ, P.C.
THE SENATE CHAMBER, MONDAY, MAY 14, 1984

[Translation]

Your Excellency:

(or should I say "Madame", the title the French have used to address their Sovereign?)

It is a privilege and a great pleasure for me to offer you the best wishes of the Government, Parliament, and all the people of Canada on the occasion of your installation as Governor General. As your first official gesture, I would ask you to send Her Majesty, the Queen of Canada, a message assuring her of our loyalty and affection.

[English]

After being represented in Canada by men for such a long time, it is right and proper that Her Majesty should finally have a woman representative here. And I am happy and proud to participate in this momentous event, the installation of our first woman Governor General.

We are gathered today to celebrate a remarkable person but also a welcome evolution of our society. In fact, for this historic event to take place the natural candidate for the position had to be available at the appropriate time.

The time is appropriate, because our modern society is increasingly aware that women's qualities of mind and heart are every bit as valuable as men's, and that we need their fresh approach and commitment to peace and mutual support in order to establish a more humane society in Canada and throughout the world.

The time is appropriate especially because, for some years now, outstanding women have been challenging and conquering old taboos. With skill and determination, they have won access to the highest positions in the land. By freeing themselves from the restrictions that circumscribed their situation, they have inspired us to shake off our old prejudices and practices.

I am thinking here of pioneers like Emily Murphy, Nellie McClung, Louise McKinney, Irene Parlby, Henrietta Muir Edwards, Thérèse Casgrain, and many others who waged an uncertain battle at difficult times in our history.

I am thinking, too, of Pauline Vanier, Norah Michener, Gabrielle Léger and Lily Schreyer, who have a special place in the hearts of Canadians because their strength and unselfishness have left their stamp on their husbands' tenures as Governors General.

Lastly, I am thinking of all those women who have opened the doors of our highest institutions to their colleagues, women like Agnes MacPhail, who in 1921 became the first woman elected to the House of Commons; Cairine Wilson, the first woman to be called to the Senate, in 1930; then in 1957, Ellen Fairclough, the first woman to serve in the federal Cabinet; Réjane Laberge-Colas, the first woman to serve on a supreme court, appointed in 1969; Muriel Ferguson, who in 1972 became the first woman to serve as Speaker of the Senate; Sylvia Ostry, who in the same year was the first woman appointed to a deputy minister's position in the federal public service; Pauline McGibbon, in 1974 appointed the country's first woman lieutenant-governor; Constance Glube, the first woman to become Chief Justice of a Supreme Court, in 1982; and Bertha Wilson, who also in 1982 became the first woman justice of the Supreme Court of Canada.

As the first woman to occupy the chair of Speaker of the House of Commons, in 1980, and to become Governor General of Canada, 1984, you stand in the line of these pioneers. During your remarkable career, you have accumulated probably more "firsts" than any other Canadian woman.

However, it is not merely to add to your record, nor because you are a woman, that the office of Governor General befalls you today. You have been chosen because, in the opinion of all, you are the ideal candidate for the position.

[Translation]

The role of Governor General is essentially one of rallying Canadians around the ideals that form the basis of our will to live together . . . and who among Canadians could do it better than you, Madame?

First of all, you represent all the richness and diversity of this country. You were born in Saskatchewan and raised in Ontario, right here in Ottawa. After completing your studies in France and Great Britain, our two mother countries, you pursued a career in Montreal in French and English television, with both the CBC and the private sector. Later, you travelled the country from one end to the other as a federal Cabinet Minister. And, as if that were not enough, as Speaker of the House of Commons you were called upon to preside over some of the most fundamental debates in the history of Canada, at the time of the referendum and the patriation of our Constitution.

This long familiarity with Canada has given you a great love for it, a love that, more than anything else, you wish others to share. No one can hear you speak of Canada without being struck by your deep sincerity. Moreover, the warmth of your personality embodies to perfection the ideals of open-mindedness and tolerance, the spirit of sharing and brotherhood, that the Fathers of Confederation dreamed of realizing in this land.

These, then, are the reasons underlying your elevation to the position of Governor General of Canada. All Canadians trust in your talents to strengthen the country's unity and to embody, with grace and nobility, that ideal out of which the Canadian federation was born and which continues to inspire it. I am sure they will not be disappointed.

I wish to thank your husband and your son for agreeing to share you with us. I hope they will enjoy helping you carry out your duties.

On behalf of all Canadians, I wish you happiness and good health.

Henri Rochefort said that France had thirty-six million subjects, not counting the subjects of discontent. Give or take a few figures, the statement also applies to Canada.

Madame, may you find the words to persuade us that, for 25 million Canadians committed to live together, there is no subject of discontent that we cannot resolve in our efforts to build this country with honour, justice and respect for our diversity.

May God keep you and inspire you.

REPLY OF HER EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL TO THE ADDRESS OF THE PRIME MINISTER

[Translation]

Prime Minister,

In accepting the high office of Governor General of Canada, I will be honoured to convey to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II, who has kindly agreed to my nomination, the message which you have entrusted to me, and with it, the assurance of the respect and affection of all Canadians.

I have been deeply touched by your words, Prime Minister. They have illustrated and emphasized your attachment to fundamental values and the importance which you place on the defence of rights and the assurance of equality. They are a testimony to the progress you have always sought to promote and preserve and to your love of this country. I also wish to thank you for having so sincerely and persuasively expressed your ideas on the significant contribution of Canadian women to the life and progress of our society.

[English]

In responding to that trust which you have conferred upon me, I follow in the footsteps of the multitude of women who, for 450 years, have served as the inspiration, and to a large degree, the artisans of this nation; those women by whose hands we have prospered and for whose spirit we have been praised. In the days and weeks ahead I will commit my efforts to the promotion of those ideals of unity, brotherhood and peace. Even then, my determination and commitment are but a small fraction and reflection of the many gestures of good will and affection I have received, and to all I am profoundly grateful.

We live in a vast land of plenty which has never been laid waste by natural or political catastrophe. Though we have our problems, they are not as tragic as those faced by people who live in destitution, by the hundreds of millions of human beings pushed to the brink of despair. We go where we like without anyone challenging our right to do so, we say what we like without anyone imposing a totalitarian philosophy or system upon us. Each person is free to follow their own star, hold whatever beliefs they choose, express their ideas and opinions without fear; goods move freely, and each individual can share in them. We are not immune to human suffering, but in Canada it is not as deep-rooted and pervasive as the heart-rending misery elsewhere in the world. Although we have to work hard, we do so in safety, and we have never been denied the right to hope.

[Translation]

It is for this reason that, from the smallest family unit to the largest gathering of our national community, we must forge a common purpose that will reinforce good will, bring together all our energies and proclaim the values we have inherited. These values are a reflection, first, of the achievements of our history, of the infinitely varied traditions preserved by our ethnic groups; in a more dynamic way, they are reflected in the long-standing effort by our nation to move along the path of modernization toward a humanism which will add to the common heritage so patiently and painstakingly built up over the years.

We have inherited a vast territory with well-established institutions, boundless resources and material wealth acquired at great sacrifice by those who have gone before, and it is our duty to fashion new tools for new hands; to go beyond our immediate horizons in search of a broader perspective; to scale new and as yet unimagined heights; and to move more quickly and surely toward the ultimate goal of expanding the potential of both the individual and the community. We must build in Canada a life to which people are not merely resigned but in which they will wish to participate fully.

[English]

Who are we and what do we wish to become? The answer is obvious. Despite our varied ethnic and racial origins we are Canadians determined to carry on the building of a great nation. We must go beyond even this ambition and aspire to set an example for the world by a deep involvement in global reconstruction, a reconstruction whose final objective is peace.

Peace is the ultimate goal from which we cannot digress as long as the world is inhabited by starving, mistreated people who are victims of the selfishness, indifference and cruelty of others. Peace should be our rallying cry, our foremost cause, and the most compelling objective of our common action.

Our commitment to peace must govern our state of mind and determine our approach to life and to work. This cannot be achieved in a nation of polarized thought and divided action. The desire for unity is, beyond doubt, the factor which inspires people to come together to create a truly human community.

In this spirit, we are fond of describing Canada as one big family. But what do we mean by family; a socio-political and cultural reality, an economic situation, a political status. All of these, of course, and also, I would hope, a common purpose to shape together the destiny of every member of the community. This can only be realized if we go beyond our border and reach out to other nations to share with them the benefits of our efforts and research.

History and geography have determined where and how we live. We are aware how the challenges and obstacles they have provided have influenced our attitudes and our behaviour. What have we achieved through our efforts? I believe that after more than three centuries, our national character is beginning to take shape. All that remains is a final delineation of the traits by which other nations identify us. As Canadians in North America, historically and culturally linked to our countries of origin, we have won the right to determine our own future and to play a role on the international scene.

[Translation]

Should not our role be to return to fundamental values, to adapt to new ways of life, to review the basis of our private and public code of ethics and to utilize for the benefit of all the marvelous products of new technology. In approaching the new frontiers made possible by modern technology we must ensure that man does not become servant to the machine, but rather its master.

This, it seems to me, is a spiritual goal that can transcend mere insular nationalism and inspire us with the ideal of making the human adventure meaningful and filled with enthusiasm and hope. If Valéry was right when he said "we now know that civilizations are mortal", we should also realize that each civilization bears within it the seeds of its own regeneration and transformation.

This is the reason I have every confidence in my fellow human beings and in man's potential and it is this that impels me to make an urgent appeal to my fellow Canadians to reach out to each other. If they would only remember that without co-operation, any attempts at communication and understanding will produce only meaningless encounters and temporary truces.

[English]

As we approach the end of this century, we are not immune to the crises that buffet our world and threaten its stability. The effects of this turmoil will be suffered even more tragically by the next generation; living as they will in apocalyptic times when virtually everything will be subject to question. We have made great material progress and worked hard to secure this legacy for our children. We now have more money and more leisure time. Despite this fact, everything around us shows signs of impatience. Weakened by advertising, persuaded to claim, to demand, to receive and to take more, we act far too often like children who leave their broken toys to demand new and more exciting ones capable of rousing them from their state of torpid satiation.

Our mistake lies in our erroneous definition of humanity and the meaning of happiness. We have been seeking such happiness beyond the rainbow and it is now time to step back and reflect calmly, to take stock of our resources so that we can again set out on a voyage of discovery and find the meaning of the human journey.

When I ponder on the youth of this country, I am filled with pride and confidence. Their search for knowledge, their need for involvement, their dynamic nature and their strength of conviction assure us that in their own time they will carry out their role in determining the future. Their attitude shows us that they will be willing to accept the responsibility of mastering their own fate.

The day will come when they will replace us, when those whom we have tried to help will leave the paths we have laid out and go another way to build the city according to their own plans and to meet the new requirements of a new age. Would it not show an unforgivable arrogance and lack of foresight on our part to try to forestall criticism of us at all costs by contriving to build and mortgage a world for the future which is not ours to create? There is a universal law that governs the progress of civilizations: one generation lays its stone, the next contributes another and, if the building material is always the same, the whole will reflect the vision, spirit and will of those who, one after the other, worked and died to build it. Although we have an obligation to build for future generations, we must not try to take their place and, in our feverish activity, give the impression that we do not trust them to be inventive and resourceful in their turn. We must prepare them for life, but we could be wrong to try to live their lives for them according to a model of our making.

As for myself, I have great faith in the youth of today. My past experience working with youth associations and my daily encounters with young people have revealed to me their spirit and potential. I am certain that when their time comes they will take up the challenge and shoulder it with success. As you yourself have said, Prime Minister, there are no insoluble problems, there are no situations that we cannot improve or correct if we unite our efforts; what we need to do is to talk to each other, to work together intelligently and honestly and let time, "the great sculptor", as Marguerite Yourcenar has so aptly put it, shape and refine the structure of our Canadian federation.

[Translation]

I believe in the strength of our people, in our collective strength, and in the power to recreate society through the practice of those time-tested virtues that have always led people to surpass themselves and give the full measure of their faith, wisdom and courage. We must practise these virtues together. My task, which I take on publicly before you, is to become better acquainted with my countrymen, to meet with them, to seek them out wherever they are in this great land, and to instil in them the confidence that makes and seals destinies. Our common task is to promote tolerance, to help each other, and to reject imitations of freedom. This is the price of our happiness, but happiness will never be found in the spirit of "every man for himself"; it requires that we share our good fortune as Canadians so that we might benefit the many peoples of the world.

To carry out my duties, I need the help of each and every one of you now and in the future. We must be united in spirit if we are to go forward in unity and brotherhood on the exhilarating road that Providence has so generously laid out before us. As Ecclesiasticus says:

"... as the governor is, so will be the inhabitants of his city." (Si 10:2)

I ask for your support in the days ahead. We share with each other a common inspiration for we have all at one time experienced the eternal truth expressed in the words of the psalm:

"If Yaweh does not build the house, in vain the masons toil..." (Ps 127)

QUESTION PERIOD

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

BILL C-12—REFERRAL TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government in connection with Bill C-12, which is presently before the house. In view of the comments made by Senator Kelly last night, I was wondering if it is intended that the bill be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee rather than the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee or the National Finance Committee? Technically, the bill could be considered by any one of these three committees, but in view of the problems raised by Senator Kelly, I wondered whether it was the intention to refer that bill to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee for study?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Flynn and I had an informal and preliminary discussion about this matter last evening. Since then, I have checked the precedents and, as Senator Flynn has said, there would be authority to send Bill C-12 to any one of the three committees he has referred to, namely the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee or the National Finance Committee.

Under rule 67 of the Rules of the Senate, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee would be eligible under (k)(iii) "taxation legislation". However, this is probably the least compelling of the three. The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, under (j)(i) "federal-provincial relations", would be eligible, since this is clearly what is involved. The third committee, the National Finance Committee, would be eligible under the heading (h)(ii) "government finance".

Since any previous matters of this nature contained the same potential for reference to the same three committees, I checked with the previous chairmen and also with the clerk's office, and apparently the National Finance Committee is accustomed to dealing with this type of legislation. Therefore, it will be the government's request to the Senate that, when Bill C-12 goes to committee in the Senate, it go to the National Finance Committee.

Senator Flynn: If that will be the motion made by the sponsor of the bill, may I ask the acting leader if there will be any objection to hearing representations from provincial ministers of education? Apparently yesterday, in the National Assembly in Quebec at least, there were some comments on and some criticism of this bill.

Also, as was indicated last evening by Senator Kelly, apparently other provincial ministers of education have criticized this measure. I would hope that whatever committee studies this bill will give those who wish to appear before it the opportunity of doing so.

Senator Frith: Without giving the impression that I agree with Senator Kelly's observations, or that the government thinks that there was insufficient consultation, I would think it unreasonable to object to any committee's hearing representations from provincial governments where the committee thinks it appropriate to do so and, therefore, speaking for myself, and to the extent that I can speak for the government, I have no such objection.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to make the observation that if this house had adopted my motion to establish an official policy with respect to provincial governments being invited to appear before Senate committees Senator Flynn would not have had to ask his question.

[Translation]

BILL C-12—NATIONAL OBJECTIVES

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to the question put by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. Since Bill C-12 is introducing for the first time, in the fiscal arrangements legislation, provisions that allow the federal Government to set conditions on the payment of subsidies for post-secondary education, and since Liberal leadership candidates have made statements to that effect, and there is also some mention of it in the bill—it is even part of the program of the leadership candidates—namely, the matter of meeting national objectives, could the Government, before this bill is referred to the appropriate Senate committee, explain what criteria or national objectives are intended by Bill C-12?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe the Government's position has already been clearly established by the bill's sponsor, Senator Hicks. As for the question raised by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, the Government will have an opportunity to explain its policies in greater detail before the committee, which is the appropriate forum for such matters.

Senator Asselin: May I ask who will be the Minister responsible for Bill C-12, and who will appear before the Senate committee? Will it be the Minister of Finance, the Minister of State for Finance or another Minister of the Government?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I did not mention the name of the Minister responsible or the Minister who will appear before the Committee. I simply said that there will be an opportunity to obtain explanations, from either the Minister responsible, the Deputy Minister or other officials who are experts on the subject. If I understand correctly, the Minister responsible is the Minister of Finance.

Senator Asselin: As for the conditions the Government wishes to set on payments for post-secondary education, does the Acting Leader of the Government feel this is a new federalism the Government wishes to introduce in federal-provincial relations?

Senator Frith: Not necessarily new, but, as usual, this Government wants to take the initiative!

CO-OPERATIVE MOVEMENT IN CANADA

RESPONSIBILITY OF MINISTER OF STATE FOR THE CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. In a press release from the Office of the Prime Minister dated May 10 of this year Senator Argue was named "to further assist the Federal Government in its liaison with Canada's co-operatives and credit unions."

First among the minister's responsibilities was that he was "to announce the overall federal stance toward the co-operative sector recently approved by Cabinet".

My question is: Has that stance, in fact, been recently approved, and has the minister announced it? If not, will he do so now?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, it has not been formally announced, but on Tuesday next I will be meeting with the press, with members of the co-operative movement and with some of my colleagues in the cabinet, and I anticipate that the announcement will be made at that time.

MEMBERSHIP OF TASK FORCE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: The second item on the Prime Minister's press release was that the minister was to ensure an effective federal reply to a report of a co-operative task force announced in the Throne Speech last December. My questions are: Has that task force been named? Who is on the task force? Have they been meeting and, if so, when? When may we expect a report?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): From memory I am unable to tell Senator Nurgitz the names of all those who comprise that task force because I do not have my notes with me. It is composed of eighteen Canadians, nine of whom come from the anglophone side, and nine of whom come from the francophone side of the co-operative movement in Canada. These Canadians represent organizations that are producers' co-operatives, as we understand them, retail co-operatives, credit unions and caisses populaires. The task force has been meeting from time to time in various parts of Canada, hearing representations from the co-operative movement and from others outside that movement as to what actions and role the movement should be playing in the days ahead.

I believe it would be correct to say that the co-operative movement—and that is part of the industrial economy and financial section of our community—has been experiencing the same kind of difficulties as those experienced by much of the other part of the private sector. The members have been looking for answers as to how they can become more efficient, as to how they can improve services to their members, as to how they can in the future play an expanded role in the Canadian economy in the financial field and in the retail field, and how they can respond to their membership and to Canadians generally. They are looking in depth at possible new structures for industrial development in this country, for example, where the owners of an industry might, in some instances at any rate, be the workers in that industry, a system of what could be called workers' co-operatives. They already have a role but they are looking for an increased one in international trade and development, as well as looking at how they can meet the challenges that lie ahead. I believe their task force report is in the final stages of being edited and printed, and my information is that that report will be ready for presentation also on Tuesday next.

Senator Nurgitz: Surely the minister will see the task force report before he responds on Tuesday. Is that not the plan?

Senator Argue: I have already seen the draft report. But, no doubt, there will be some changes in it. I have in my possession an early draft, but not the final presentation. I have been studying that draft. But there may well be some changes that will be apparent on Tuesday next.

NEWFOUNDLAND

ICE STORM—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO VICTIMS

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on May 8 concerning what action the government plans to take under the federal Disaster Financial Assistance Program to alleviate the situation caused by the severe ice storm in Newfoundland on the weekend of April 13.

Honourable senators, discussions are going on between federal and provincial officials as to the extent of assistance that is needed. Provincial officials now know, however, of the federal government's willingness to help through the Disaster Financial Assistance arrangements and of the limitations to this help and the conditions under which it would be provided.

To provide the detail Senator Marshall has asked for, I should like, with the permission of the Senate, to have incorporated into the Debates of the Senate a series of telexes between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland that set out what I have just said, namely, that the two governments are discussing the matter and the extent of the federal government's intention to help.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The telexes follow:)

May 4th, 1984

St. John's, Newfoundland
Telex: 0164718
Honourable Yvon Pinard,
President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Emergency Planning Canada,
Government of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario

First I want to thank you for the prompt and forthcoming way in which you have responded to my telex of April 25th. Your agreement to consider sharing the costs with the province which were incurred by Newfoundland and Labrador Hydro and Newfoundland Light and Power Company in restoring electrical power after the April 13th ice storm is most encouraging. As I indicated in my initial telex on this matter, the financial assistance of the federal government is critical as the province is unable to sustain an assistance program alone.

I have had one of my officials contact Mr. D.W. Hall of your office. As I understand, a meeting is tentatively arranged in St. John's on either the 11th or 14th of this month. We are hopeful that a suitable arrangement can be agreed upon at that time to determine the eligibility of costs to be shared between our two governments.

WILLIAM W. MARSHALL
President of the Executive Council and Minister Responsible for Energy

FROM:

The Honourable Yvon Pinard, President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Emergency Planning.

TO:

The Honourable William Marshall, President of the Executive Council, Government of Newfoundland, St. John's, Newfoundland.

Dear Mr. Marshall:

Thank you for your recent message regarding the severe storm which struck the Avalon Peninsula during the weekend of April 13th. May I express, through you, my sympathy to the people whose lives were so severely disrupted by the loss of electrical power over a rather extended period of time. The federal government will be pleased to provide financial assistance in meeting the costs incurred by your government in recovering from this storm in accordance with the arrangements established for such assistance under disaster financial assistance guidelines.

My statement in the House of Commons, to which you refer in your message, was that "... the federal government could contribute up to 90 per cent of the cost of the damages suffered ...". This is in keeping with the disaster financial assistance guidelines which provide for the federal government to assist a province in accordance with a formula which relates disaster expenditures to the provincial population. The federal share is 90 per cent for that portion of eligible provincial government expenditures which exceed five dollars per capita of the provincial population. At the time I made the statement, it appeared that costs could well exceed this level.

I will not go into the details of the guidelines here but will merely mention that federal assistance is given when the costs of a disaster exceed what a province can reasonably be expected to bear on its own but, as is implied by the phrase "eligible provincial expenditures", not all disaster related expenditures are shared. Therefore, I am not able to give unqualified assurance that any expenditure by your government to defray costs incurred by Newfoundland Hydro and Newfoundland Light and Power, as well as those incurred by other businesses and by individuals, would qualify for federal assistance. Expenditures by a provincial government to assist crown corporations and so-called "big businesses" in meeting the effects of disasters, qualify only in particular circumstance but I am quite ready to consider sharing with the Newfoundland government the defrayal of certain costs incurred by Newfoundland Hydro, Newfoundland Light and Power in dealing with the recent storm. Since a federal-provincial shared cost program to repair storm damage to an electrical power distribution system represents a precedent, I have asked Mr. D.W. Hall, Director General (Operations) of EPC, to go to Newfoundland to work out with your officials suitable criteria for expenditures which might be eligible. Following this, Mr. David Snow, Emergency Planning Canada's regional director for Newfoundland, will be the federal government's representative to work with your officials in determining the details.

I trust that by working together in this way our governments will be able to alleviate, to a significant degree, the hardships caused the people of Newfoundland by this unfortunate event.

April 27, 1984

From:

Roger Young, Executive Assistant to Hon. Yvon Pinard.

To:

William Marshall, President of the Executive Council,
St. John's,
Newfoundland.

Dear Mr. Marshall:

On behalf of the Honourable Yvon Pinard, President of the Privy Council, who is currently out of the country, please allow me to acknowledge receipt of your telex of the 25th concerning the severe ice storm which recently devastated portions of Newfoundland causing damage to hydro and utility lines.

Please be assured this will be brought to the attention of Mr. Pinard immediately upon his return on Monday, the 30th. In the meantime, I have taken the liberty of referring your request to senior officials of Emergency Planning Canada.

Yours sincerely,

ROGER YOUNG,
Executive Assistant.

Honourable Yvon Pinard,
President of the Privy Council and Minister
Responsible for Emergency Planning Canada,
Government of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario

Dear Mr. Pinard:

As you are aware, during the period April 13-15, 1984, a severe ice storm devastated the northern portions of the Avalon Peninsula causing extensive damage to hydro and utility lines. The immediate impact on residents and business was a loss of electricity for several days. In some areas electrical power is only now being restored nearly two weeks after the storm.

For our electrical utility companies, Newfoundland and Labrador Hydro and Newfoundland Light and Power Company Limited, damage was extensive. Ice up to 12 inches in diameter coated utility wires and support structures causing them to break in many areas. The main transmission lines from our Bay D'Espoir Hydro Station and the Holyrood Terminal Station all failed resulting in the loss of electric power to most of the Avalon Peninsula affecting 175,000 people. The costs to Newfoundland Hydro and Newfoundland Light and Power have now been estimated at 7,000,000 dollars.

Other large companies which sustained heavy losses include Newfoundland Telephone Company and several radio and television companies. At this point we have not been able to tabulate the cost of damages by individual residents and other businesses as a result of broken utility lines and loss of electrical power. However, our belief is that taken alone they will be less than the value where there could be any significant federal cost-sharing under the disaster financial assistance arrangements.

The province is now in the process of trying to determine what kind of assistance program, if any, might be available to help alleviate the burden placed on business and residents alike as a consequence of the storm. The province is unable to sustain an assistance program alone because of our limited fiscal capacity and budgetary restraint program. Consequently, the assistance of the federal government is critical if the province is to respond to the damages incurred by both the large utilities and the individual citizen.

I therefore welcome your statement in the House of Commons on April 16, 1984, which I understand was made in response to a question from the Honourable James McGrath, in which you recognized the extent of the damage caused by the storm and offered federal financial assistance to the province to cope with the costs of damages. Your offer of up to 90 per cent of the damages suffered in Newfoundland is most encouraging indeed.

At this time I am requesting confirmation that the expenditures incurred by Newfoundland Hydro and Newfoundland Light and Power in repairing hydro and utility lines will be eligible for assistance under the disaster financial assistance program as well as losses incurred by other businesses and individuals.

I trust that you will give immediate attention to this request and that you will provide the required clarification on the extent of federal assistance available as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,

WILLIAM MARSHALL,
President of the Executive Council

OLYMPIC GAMES

SOVIET UNION BOYCOTT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on May 10, 1984, concerning the Soviet boycott of the Los Angeles Olympic Games and possible mediation—I was going to say meditation, but “mediation” is the word—by the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You started with a good word, “meditation.”

Senator Frith: Senator Asselin will remember that I was compelled to answer a question last night by a “non et non;” this time I have a “oui et oui” response.

Honourable senators, the report of withdrawals of the U.S.S.R. and its allies from the Los Angeles Summer Games is disappointing, especially in view of recent signs of a general desire to improve East-West relations.

Canada does not believe that the concerns expressed by the U.S.S.R. in regard to arrangements for the games justify such a Draconian step.

To the best of our knowledge, the American authorities have indeed adhered to the spirit and letter of the Olympic Charter. We hope the Soviet Union and the other nations who are supporting the Soviet position will reconsider this decision and that all countries will attend the games.

The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport stated, in response to a question by a journalist, that, if asked, he would offer his services as a mediator to both parties involved in the controversy. However, Canada has not been asked to mediate the dispute and, if asked, would certainly consider it. Obviously, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as the minister responsible for Canada's external relations, would be consulted and would carry the responsibility for any such action.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That could be a challenge.

Senator Frith: I assume that the "if asked" does not include being asked by Senator Asselin.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is still a "non et non."

Senator Frith: But "oui" that I have the information.

Senator Asselin: Senator Frith should consult Senator Perreault since he is an expert on that.

Senator Frith: Next time I will.

OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

VACANCY

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Murray on May 8, 1984, regarding the government's intentions concerning the Office of the Comptroller General.

Honourable senators, the position of Comptroller General is presently being retained as it is. Mr. William Bindman has been appointed acting Comptroller General and will continue in those functions until a successor to Mr. Rogers is named.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lapointe, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-12, intituled: "An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977".—(Honourable Senator Tremblay).

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, although I do not normally ask for attention since I do not feel I am any more entitled to it than anyone else, I should like to make a comment concerning our arrangements for Tuesday evening respecting this order.

The informal agreement—not a house order or anything of that kind—is that we will continue the debate on Bill C-12 tomorrow and on Tuesday evening, and that we will have a vote for reference to the committee on Tuesday evening. Indeed, it is virtually certain that that will be a recorded vote. Honourable senators might note that, according to the present discussions between the government and the opposition in the Senate, we expect that, on Tuesday night after continued debate, there will be a recorded vote on Bill C-12.

I understand that Senator Hicks cannot be here next week. He is the sponsor of the bill and I will ask him to give me instructions on closing the debate on second reading on his behalf.

Unless others have something more to add, I agree that the order should stand.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On this point, honourable senators, I merely wanted to point out that when I, on behalf of Senator Tremblay, asked that this item stand, I had no objection to anyone else speaking to it. More specifically, if Senator Thériault wants to express the viewpoint of the regions as something different from that of the provinces, we would welcome his using this occasion to do so.

Senator Frith: With those cordial exchanges, I take it that the order stands.

Order stands.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, P. C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Cottreau, for the second reading of the Bill C-23, intituled: "An Act to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act".—(Honourable Senator Bielish).

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate on the amendment to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act was introduced in 1957 by the Conservative administration under the leadership of the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker. It is an excellent piece of legislation and has served the western grain producers over more than a quarter of a century. It has been amended and upgraded as times changed and conditions warranted. This is precisely what we are doing now.

The first amendment proposes that limits on advance payments be doubled from $15,000 to $30,000 for individual producers, from $30,000 to $60,000 for multi-farmer units involving two participants, and up to $90,000 for multi-farmer units involving three or more participants. In addition, the maximum advance for drying tough grain is being raised from $1,500 to $3,000, and the maximum advance for unthreshed grain will be doubled from $7,500 to $15,000.

The second amendment makes it possible for further adjustments to the maximum advance payment to be made a part of the appropriations act of Parliament. This, of course, will speed up changes in the legislation, if changes are necessary.

The third change proposed by Bill C-23 is the revocation of subsection 7(3.1) of the act, which excluded spouses from participation in the program. Honourable members of the opposition in the other place have consistently requested this amendment. In fact, the honourable member from Drumheller made that the subject of a private member's bill, Bill C-218. I am very pleased that this amendment is in place, for it will put an end to this form of discrimination between spouses, involving, for the most part, farm women or farmers' wives. Farmers' wives, as honourable senators know, have no pension plans and lack many of the amenities of the urban woman. I trust that this amendment will prove to be a move towards equality between the sexes on the farm.

Honourable senators, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act does not provide a subsidy. It does not provide a grant. It simply provides for an advance on the farmers' grain which is taken off of his cheque when he delivers the grain. It is a useful tool and we on this side welcome the bill and will be happy to see it passed. Thank you.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, having listened to my colleague remind us that this legislation was introduced by the Diefenbaker government in one of its first years, perhaps I might be allowed to add a footnote to history by saying that, when this measure was first advocated in the election of 1957, it was declared to be impossible of accomplishment by the government of the day. I well remember a meeting in Morris, Manitoba—as I am sure does Senator Hazen Argue—when Mr. C. D. Howe, a justly famous Canadian statesman, appeared on the platform when the subject was discussed. A member of the audience did not like what he had to say in turning down this idea, and approached the platform to reproach Mr. Howe. When Mr. Howe heard the complaint, he tapped the gentleman in the tummy and said “You look fat enough to me,” intimating that he did not really need this kind of help. The only thing is that the man turned out to be the President of the local Liberal association, and that was a significant factor in overturning the government in that seat.

● (1420)

I also recall coming down to this city during that time, advocating this bill, and being told by ministerial advisers of the highest rank that it was quite impossible to implement a bill of this sort. The only trouble is that Mr. Diefenbaker did it.

[Senator Bielish.]

It has worked quite well. I agree with what my colleague, Senator Bielish, had to say. However, the minister, in his speech last night, made some interesting—what is it when someone says something he does not have to say, but he says it anyway? Is it obiter dictum?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That's right.

Senator Roblin: He made an obiter dictum respecting the nature of this bill. In the final minutes of his speech, the minister spoke about price. He linked the bill with the initial price statement that was made a few days ago. He commented on that fact and said that he was fully convinced:

—that there will be final payments on all of these commodities much in excess of the drop in the initial price.

I hope he is right. However, I want him to put a little more definition on how he views the outcome of this matter, because there are a great many people in western Canada who will want to know.

In the rest of his statement he led me to believe that he regarded the situation as being such that the final payment would be at least equal to the final payment last year. I think that is the impression—

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I did not mean to give that impression. If that appears there, then it is an error.

Senator Roblin: I am making these comments because I want the minister to explain it more clearly to us. I want him to tell us what his statement means:

—that there will be final payments on all of these commodities much in excess of the drop in the initial price.

That is my first point. My second point is that the minister goes on to say:

With regard to spring wheat, it is a postponement of some 28 cents a bushel.

Twenty-eight cents from what? Where does that figure come from? I thought he meant that 28 cents was the difference between the initial price and some other figure. I presume that is what it is. What is that figure? Will the minister clarify that for us?

Hon. D. G. Steuart: It is 28 cents more than in the first place.

Senator Roblin: I know; but did the minister pull that figure out of the hat, or did he have some basis for it? I think he should tell us. I believe that Senator Steuart suspects that he may have pulled it out of the hat.

Senator Steuart: No, no.

Senator Roblin: Oh well, if Senator Steuart holds a contrary opinion, then I would be the last one to contradict him.

Senator Flynn: He shows his blind faith, anyway.

Senator Roblin: I am glad he is listening. That's something. Continuing with this mathematical exercise on the postponement of 28 cents a bushel, the minister then said that if a farmer goes and gets the cash advance for the extra $15,000 that is allowed here, then that is the same as a reduction—I do not know what that reduction is—on 53,000 bushels of wheat. The minister then made the following statement:

Perhaps that is not a comparison that would stand a logical examination.

I guess that is the point that really brought me to my feet. I am convinced he was right when he made that statment. If he has any further information that can clarify the issue, it will be welcome, because it becomes important. The minister came up with a figure that the loss to the farmer was .02 of a cent per bushel.

Senator Argue: That should be two cents.

Senator Roblin: It says “.02 of a cent a bushel”. Perhaps I misread it.

Senator Argue: Perhaps it is .02 dollars.

Senator Roblin: The minister may take the opportunity to correct that. That comes to about $106.00 for all those bushels. I wonder what that had to do with the argument.

Senator Argue: I did not read the blues last night so I will have to take the blame for that.

Senator Roblin: Then you may correct them now.

There was one final point on which I think the minister should comment before he closes the debate. It has to do with the money that he thinks will be paid out under the Western Grain Stabilization Act. I am not quite clear how a discussion of this act got into a debate on advances on farm-stored grain.

Senator Argue: If you read the House of Commons Debates, you will find that they put a lot of stuff in.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is usually better organized than that. In any event, he did talk about the matter and he said that when this Western Grain Stabilization Act is amended producers will receive payments in excess of $1 billion within the next three years. That comment caused me to perk up my ears because if they get $1 billion in the next three years it may deplete the fund. There is about $900 million in it now and even though some people, as well as the government, are still paying into it, if they lose $1 billion over the next three years, it will make for pretty small “pickins” compared to what we are used to. My point is that, if by liberalizing the trigger mechanism under the Western Grain Stabilization Act it depletes the fund, what will happen when we have a really bad year? Before, the old fund would have been triggered into action, but now there will be nothing left in the kitty.

In view of the fact that the minister takes the authority for the statement that $1 billion will be paid out in the next three years, will he tell us when he replies just how he envisages the Western Grain Stabilization Act fulfilling its original function, to say nothing of this liberalized new function if the drain on the funds is as drastic as he proposes? It seems to me that one should know something about this matter before giving further consideration to the legislation the minister has in mind.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Argue speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I appreciate the remarks made by Senator Bielish and Senator Roblin. It is clear from those remarks that this legislation has the strong support of the opposition, as it does of the government members. Senator Roblin went back and gave us some factual information that in 1957 the Diefenbaker administration introduced the original Prairie Grain Advanced Payments Act. If memory serves me correctly, and it may not, the maximum then was $3,000. In any event, it has improved and—

Senator Roblin: It shows you what inflation has done to us.

Senator Argue: That is part of it. I would think that when you exclude inflation the increase is probably not 10 times but, in any event, I want to give full credit to the administration that brought in the act in the first place.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: The records of the House of Commons will show—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Did you vote for the bill?

Senator Argue: I always voted for anything that in my opinion was good. Not only did I vote for it but I campaigned for it for years, probably a little more expansively but not with the same amount of accomplishment as the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker. However, I think I exercised my responsibility and availed myself of the opportunity as a member of the House of Commons in those days when I championed the provision of interest free cash advances. Although the late Honourable C.D. Howe had reservations at the time, I think history will show that he made a very outstanding contribution to the grain industry of western Canada over a lifetime of service, both in the private field as a man who constructed the great terminals in western Canada and as the minister who made it possible after the war for the Canadian Wheat Board to continue its authority as the exclusive agency in the export of wheat, oats and barley. I suppose the fact that I came from another party, joined the Liberal party, have been happy ever since—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: —and am now in a position to pilot this bill through this august chamber, which is equal in every respect to the other place, gives me a great deal of satisfaction. I suppose I have probably been campaigning for this cause longer than anyone else in the Senate. I take some satisfaction in having been associated with colleagues who are so responsive to the needs of western Canada and the western grain producers.

Senator Roblin raised some questions with respect to my mathematics, the drop in the initial payment and what I said with respect to a final payment. The drop in the initial payment for No. 1 CW spring wheat, which is the main grain and grade, was from $170 a tonne one year ago to $160 a tonne for the coming crop year. That is a drop of $10 per tonne, which is equal to a drop of 28 cents per bushel. Thus, that is where my 28 cents comes from.

I then went on to say that I was fully confident that whatever the final payment will be—and I certainly have no idea what it might be—it will be in excess of the $10 a tonne drop. In other words, it is a postponement of income and not a permanent loss of income.

I then went on to calculate roughly the Wheat Board's return on its investments, which is around 11 per cent to 12 per cent now, I think, as compared to whatever a farmer might pay. Obviously, that will vary from farmer to farmer, but it will account for, say, a 6 per cent difference. Therefore, I simply took 6 per cent of 28 cents and in my rough mathematics came out with something under 2 cents per bushel, not ".02 of a cent", which is a printer's error found on page 569 of the Debates of the Senate. The figure should have been $.02 or 2 cents.

I am fully confident that there is no danger but that some very substantial additional sums can be, and will be, paid. We are not into next year's crops, therefore we do not know what the prices for those crops will be. However, yesterday the price for No. 1 CW 13.5 per cent protein was being quoted at $221 a tonne. If you subtract $10 a tonne for the 13.5 per cent bonus, or premium, you arrive at the figure of $210 a tonne, which is $50 a tonne over and above the $160 a tonne. My information, which of course varies from year to year, is that in all its costs the Wheat Board has to pay something under $10 a tonne, which I think allows an adequate margin. Unless there is to be a complete catastrophe in international prices—and I do not foresee one—it seems perfectly safe to assume that the final payment on the crop to be marketed commencing August 1 will be sufficient to cover that amount.

Obviously, there are differences of opinion when initial prices are being set with respect to how safe we should be, how far prices should drop, or even if they should drop at all. The result of the consensus which we pulled together was that this was a reasonable thing to do, having taken into account all of the information and recommendations which came to hand. Thus, there was a drop in the initial prices for wheat in the order of 28 cents a bushel, which I think is a modest drop. Of course, if a farmer has 5,000 bushels of wheat on hand in excess of the first 5,000 he needs for the first $15,000 cash advance, which means he is likely to obtain the 30, then on another 5,000 he will have a cash flow of $15,000, or $3 a bushel. This drop is obviously 28 cents a bushel and, as I say, while that may not be the most logical thing to say, the drop in the initial price constitutes some reduction in cash flow. On the other hand, obviously, the increase in the advance payment is an increase in cash flow.

● (1430)

I then went on to say that amendments are being proposed to change the Western Grain Stabilization Act and that these are currently in draft form in a bill being given first reading in the other place. Further, I said that on the basis of forecasts by officials, based on current conditions, they would anticipate that, within the next three years, there will be payments out of the fund totalling something in excess of $1 billion.

These will not, of course, be the final figures. They are projections, and nobody could be that accurate. However, if there is an upward movement in world international prices and if export quantities remain approximately the same, probably less money will be paid out. If, on the other hand, there should be a decrease in export sales; if world prices should stay the same as they are or drop, then obviously there would be a greater payment out of the fund. However, these are the best projections that can be made, taking into account current statistics.

I said last night that the experts tell us that while these amendments will result in some major pay-outs, nonetheless the program, on the basis of a 20-year forecast, will remain actuarially sound. I have been informed by those who I think know what they are talking about that to be actuarially sound does not mean that, perhaps in one year out of the whole 20, there might not be a tiny deficit in the account. That is my information, but if someone else says that is not the case, I will not argue. However, to be actuarially sound, it must be sound over this long period, and that means that the flow of money in and out of the account over a 20-year period will not result in an extra, unforeseen cost to the federal treasury.

At the end of the last calendar year, there was in this account something under $900 million. The payments into it today, I understand, are running at the rate of approximately $150 million a year; that is $50 million a year from the producers and $100 million a year from the treasury of Canada. In addition to that, of course, the fund collects interest on the money that is on hand, which I believe this year is estimated to be approximately $60 million. If you add $150 million a year as the income into the fund for the next three years, that would be a grand total of $1.35 billion plus the interest accumulated, which would be over and above that figure. If the experts are correct, there will be something in excess of $1 billion paid out in the next three years. That would leave something in excess of $300 million still remaining in the fund, quite apart from the interest income.

People who know the international grain business would say that we are in a downturn. Hopefully, we are at the low part of the cycle and therefore the future should mean increased international prices for grain. That takes me back to my earlier statement that the bill that has been presented in the other place is sound and well founded. Based on current circumstances, I think the projection of these kinds of payments is necessary to the western grain economy. Even with such very large payments, there will still be very substantial sums of money in the account at the end of the next three years. Therefore, I think we will get the best of all worlds: namely, the producers will receive very substantial payments and the fund will remain actuarially sound.

Although it is not the main subject under discussion, it is my view that the Western Grain Stabilization Act was good legislation and has been of benefit to western producers.

[Senator Argue.]

Seventy-six per cent of the approximately 150,000 permit holders belong to the Western Grain Stabilization Fund on a voluntary basis. I believe that they will be happy and satisfied with the payments. I expect the complaints and the criticisms to come mainly from the 24 per cent who decided to exercise their own judgment and save the money by not contributing to the fund and therefore, of course, forgoing the benefits that are coming from the fund.

It is my hope that this legislation will be passed by the Senate today. As soon as Royal Assent is given, I am sure that the work will begin quickly in preparing the proper forms and arrangements so that, on August 1 of this year, the producers will be able to obtain cash advances to a maximum of $30,000 for an individual.

Senator Roblin: I presume that my honourable friend will be able, perhaps at the committee stage, to give the Senate the financial details that lie behind the Western Grain Stabilization Act in order that we can look at the numbers that he has been talking about here.

However, I really wanted to ask another question of the minister. In view of the fact that, according to him, it is safe to assume that the wheat market will get better, can he give us some idea as to when consideration will be given to making an interim payment, in addition to the initial payment that has been made.

Senator Argue: At this time, it is a little too early to say. The crop year is some distance away. Perhaps within the next six weeks we can have another look at the situation and canvas, once again, those who provide advice to see whether or not action should be taken prior to August 1 of this year. If no action is taken before that time, perhaps early in the crop year we will take a look, as we have always done during my tenure, to see whether or not we can bring about an interim payment during the crop year.

At the moment, the price is approximately $10 a tonne better than when the initial price was forecast and established for the new year. However, that is something that should be looked at on the basis of that outline.

I do not know the intentions of the Senate with regard to further study of this measure by committee, but I can undertake to supply Senator Roblin with all of the documentary information that was given to me and was included in the calculations that resulted in the preparation of the bill that is now before the other place.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend should give some assurance that the interim payment will be made in good time for the federal election.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am assuming that there is an answer to that question and that the undertaking will be forthcoming—

Senator Roblin: Do not worry; it will be there in good time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, for your information, on the question of the referral of this bill to committee, I would like to inform the Senate that this bill and the next bill on the Order Paper, C-4, both were passed at all three stages in the other place without reference to a committee. However, the fact that the other place did not send these bills to committee does not mean that we must follow suit. The real issue for us is that, if there was a good reason, in our opinion, why these bills did not go to committee in the other place, then the same reason might apply here. I simply wondered whether there was a way the figures Senator Roblin requested could be put on the record without having this bill referred to committee. It is, of course, possible that the Senate might decide that both of these bills should be referred to committee, but, as I said, if we can provide the information, in the event that the Senate should decide not to do so, and because there seemed to be support for the bill from both sides of the house at all three stages in the other place, I suggest that when this bill receives second reading, as seems likely today, we defer third reading until tomorrow to afford Senator Argue an opportunity to provide that information to Senator Roblin. I think it would be useful to have that information on the record, rather than have it simply sent to Senator Roblin.

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we are confusing two matters here; the figures I am most particularly interested in are those which have to do with the Western Grain Stabilization Act amendments, which are to come. There is no problem in connection with this bill, but if there are further figures that can be provided, I do not see why we cannot refer this to the Committee of the Whole to enable Senator Argue to explain those further figures to us. We can then proceed at an accelerated rate as far as the rest of the procedure is concerned.

Senator Argue: As Senator Roblin has correctly pointed out, his questions had to do with the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the amendments thereto. I am prepared to provide him with all the information available. I would think that that would cover everything.

Senator Roblin: I am satisfied with that.

Hon. Peter Bosa: I am not a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, so I hope that the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board can answer my question, which is as follows: Is there similar legislation that would provide advance payments to farmers living in Ontario?

Senator Argue: Yes, and that is administered by the Department of Agriculture, as one might expect. The farmers who receive cash advances in Ontario and for grains other than those covered in this act receive exactly the same kind of treatment. There are cash advances and cash payments available for commodities such as canola, and so forth, in other parts of the country.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Argue, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault moved that Bill C-4, an Act to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, be read the second time.

He said: Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I propose the second reading of Bill C-4. I realize it will surprise my honourable colleagues to hear that anything that even remotely concerns our Canadian fisheries on the East and West Coasts is, and always has been, very important to me, being from the East Coast and part of a family that for generations has been involved in the fishing industry and its development.

In fact, I must admit that every time I hear my honourable friends from Western Canada, with an equally fervent interest in western agriculture, debate matters relating to payments or advances, I wonder whether the day will come when East and West Coast fishermen will receive the same treatment as western farmers.

The purpose of Bill C-4 is to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, which covers the activities of all foreign support ships and fishing vessels in Canadian waters. It controls these activities largely through licences and permits issued by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans under the appropriate regulations, and enforcement is based on the Department's surveillance and compliance program.

Briefly, the amendments proposed in Bill C-4 will dramatically increase the fines imposed on foreign fishermen violating domestic fishing legislation within the 200-mile commercial zone adjacent to Canada's east and west coasts. These amendments will also reinforce the legal implications of the Act, so that any violation of the regulations may be prosecuted. More specifically, the maximum fines for violating subsection 3(2) will be raised from $25,000 to $100,000, on conviction on indictment, and from $5,000 to $25,000 on summary conviction.

The subsection in question covers basic violations of the Act, namely, unauthorized fishing and harvesting of marine plants by persons on board foreign vessels, in Canadian waters, as well as a certain number of other related activities such as transshipment or unloading of cargo, crew transfers and purchases in port.

The amendments will also raise the maximum fines for violations of paragraphs 7a), 7b) and 7c) of the Act. These concern illegal entry by foreign fishing vessels in Canadian fisheries and refusal of foreign captains to answer questions asked by our fisheries protection officers. They also deal with unlawful destruction, by crew members of foreign vessels, of compromising equipment or cargo on board the foreign vessel.

[English]

Fines for these offences would be increased to $25,000 from $10,000 on indictment, and to $5,000 from $2,000 on summary conviction.

I think it important to point out that the amendments will bring our regulations into line with the consensus reached at the Law of the Sea Conference in that prison terms will be dropped in all cases except under section 7(d) of the act. This section deals with the resisting or obstruction of protection officers.

In this case the penalty will increase on indictment from $10,000 and/or one year imprisonment to $25,000 and/or two years imprisonment. This would bring the section into conformity with the Criminal Code and give our fishery officers the same protection as they now enjoy as peace officers.

Honourable senators, you will also note that Bill C-4 has an added clause which makes any contravention of the regulations an offence subject to a maximum fine of $25,000 on indictment and $5,000 on summary conviction. The act now, while it gives a general power to prescribe the terms and conditions of foreign fishing licences, does not make perfectly clear that any violation of these terms and conditions is an offence. The proposed legislation would remove any ambiguity that may exist under the present situation.

I should like to emphasize that the penalty increases are a clear reflection of the serious view we take of foreign fishing violations in Canadian waters. Although foreign fishing has been greatly reduced within our 200-mile zone since extended jurisdiction came into effect in 1977, coupled with the vigilant surveillance and enforcement program of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans as a strong deterrent to illicit foreign fishing, we owe it to our fishermen to strengthen our jurisdiction.

It should be noted that in addition to the penalties already discussed, the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act gives the courts the power to order the forfeiture of a foreign vessel, its catch and the equipment used on board if an offence has been committed. The regulations also provide the authority to cancel any licence or permit.

● (1450)

It is perhaps pertinent to look at the record of convictions and fines under the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act and the Foreign Vessel Fishing Regulations since 1977. In the six-year period between 1977 and 1983, there was a total of 115 convictions which resulted in total fines of $839,767. By a rough calculation that works out to an average fine of just over $7,000 per conviction. If one contrasts that to the fact that a foreign trawler fishing illegally off the Tail of the Banks could easily take cod valued at $30,000 or more on the European market in a single day's fishing, then I think it is fairly clear that we need some very strong deterrents in order that foreign fishing captains will realize that it is not worth their while to plunder our fish stocks.

In this context, it is also interesting to compare penalties that currently exist in other countries under similar statutes.

For instance, in the United States, fines run to $100,000, while in the United Kingdom there is a maximum fine of approximately $93,000 on summary conviction, and a fine at the discretion of the court on indictment. In New Zealand, fines go to approximately $85,000, and in Japan fines go to approximately $50,000. These amounts are all set out in equivalent Canadian funds. In most of these cases forfeiture orders are also provided for.

Obviously, there is quite a discrepancy between the level of these penalties and those existing in Canada under the present legislation, a fact which might encourage would-be poachers to take a gamble in our zone rather than in that of our neighbours to the south.

However, I should like to stress that it is full compliance with our regulations that we are striving for and not an increase in convictions and fines. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has in place an efficient and effective surveillance and enforcement program. The proposed amendments will strengthen this program and give us even stricter control over foreign fishing activities within the 200-mile fishing zone.

Honourable senators, while I am quite confident that all Canadian fishermen and the Canadian public in general are in agreement with this legislation, I hope that I can have the same support from honourable senators. While this kind of legislation may not have the immediate and direct results that the fishermen would hope for, I am convinced that the future security of the fishing industry relies heavily on the fact that we can patrol adequately our 200-mile fishing zone. As has been suggested by the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, this bill was not referred to committee in the other place, and I do not think we should refer it to committee here either.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, may I be so bold as to say a few words on this bill before the motion for adjournment is moved? Senator Thériault said that he wondered whether or not the time would come when the fishermen and the fisheries industry were given the same kind of consideration as the grain industry, which is what has prompted a response from me.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Honourable Pierre De Bané is very concerned about the state of the fishing industry in Canada and has brought forward many proposals and policies that are helpful for the industry in these difficult times. There has been a feeling amongst some of us that perhaps the fishing industry could make use of some of the policies that have been used for the grain industry in western Canada. The Canadian Wheat Board is a central marketing agency. It has within its jurisdiction and associated with it all of the component parts of the grain industry—the privately-owned component, the co-operatively-owned component and some government-owned components. The central marketing agency is able to make long-term agreements with the government and other importing agencies. It pays initial prices for the various grades of grains that it takes into account. Hopefully, it pays a price that is safe and at the end there is almost always a profit and money to be paid out.

It would seem to me that the fishing industry might look at these very broad principles, because if you are going to sell codfish perhaps we do not need 10 or 100 salesmen selling the same product. Perhaps one sales agency might have some merit. I know that the Canadian Wheat Board has made some input to those who are interested in the fishing industry in order to outline the principles of how the Canadian Wheat Board operates the grain agency. Then the fishermen and the component parts of the fishing industry will decide whether or not there are policies that are used for the grain industry that would be helpful in the fishing industry.

I want to assure my honourable colleague that as a Canadian I fully support the same kind of consideration for the fishing industry that is given to the grain industry at any given time. Whether we are fishermen in the east or grain growers in western Canada, we need a prosperous industry, and if we can help bring that about collectively that is what we would like to do.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am glad that Senator Argue feels that way. The whole question of marketing was studied at some length by the Kirby commission, but the government of the day at that time did not see fit to accept some of the proposals, made by a number of people interested in the industry, for central marketing agencies for fisheries, which I support. In my opinion, the difference is—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I do not like to interrupt Senator Thériault, but would it not be more appropriate for him to make these remarks in his closing speech replying to all the points made in the debate? Otherwise, he will find himself speaking two or three times.

Senator Thériault: Fine.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we proceed to the next order, I should like to remind honourable senators that several committees will be meeting shortly. There is the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages in Room 269 of the East Block at 3.30; the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources in Room 250 in the East Block at 4.00; and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in Room 356-S when the Senate rises.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented in the Senate on 8th May, 1984.—

(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, this report deals solely with the importation of fruits and vegetables of a kind grown in Canada. When counsel for our committee examined these regulations, he came to the conclusion that they were ultra vires, in other words, they were illegal. On instructions from the committee he wrote to the department to ask for their reaction to his opinion. On February 14, 1983, the designated instruments officer for the Department of Agriculture informed the committee that these regulations are in the opinion of departmental counsel ultra vires; in other words, illegal.

After considering that reply, we wrote to the Minister of Agriculture, and I quote from the report:

—to ask for his personal assurance that customs officers would be requested to cease applying the Regulations to imports of fresh fruit and vegetables. In their letter, the Chairmen recorded the Committee's belief that it is "highly improper for officers of the Government of Canada to persist in enforcing Regulations which they admit to be ultra vires—

● (1500)

I should like to read part of the report which is self-explanatory and can express the situation better than I can. It states:

On January 31, 1984, the Minister of Agriculture replied that "it has become clearly evident through our consultations that should these Regulations be revoked the Canadian produce industry would be seriously jeopardized". On this basis, the Minister proposed "to postpone action on these Regulations pending an amendment to the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act, which will empower similar regulations under that Act", and stated that "such an amendment is currently being introduced through normal legal channels".

Your Committee, while it notes the undertaking to seek appropriate legislative authority for regulations of this kind, is firmly of the view that the continued application of these Regulations at the present time involves an inadmissible departure from the usages of Parliamentary government and a repudiation of the concept of the Rule of Law which is at the heart of our constitutional order. While your committee recognizes that the revocation of these import restrictions may result in an economic disadvantage for domestic producers of fruit and vegetables, it does not accept that this justifies the Executive in illegally restricting the liberty of trade and commerce of Canadian importers. To do so would be to accept that ours is a government of men and not of laws.

For the Executive to persist in enforcing Regulations which it acknowledges to be unauthorized by law strikes your Committee as wrong and completely unacceptable. That such a course of action should have the support of a Minister of the Crown is a matter of even greater concern to your Committee.

Pending the adoption of appropriate legislation by Parliament, your Committee recommends that immediate steps be taken to ensure that customs officers charged with their enforcement cease to apply these illegal Regulations to imports of fresh fruit and vegetables.

Honourable senators, I think it is up to this chamber to show that this country is governed by laws and not by the Minister of Agriculture deciding on his own that something should be done in spite of the fact it is illegal. He is going ahead and doing what he admits is illegal.

Since we published this report, the joint chairmen have received a communication from Danny Dempster, Executive Vice-President, The Canadian Horticultural Council and The Canadian Fruit Wholesalers Distribution, expressing great concern about the action of the committee and the effect it would have upon the industry. He says:

We find the position of the joint committee to be unacceptable particularly in light of the time required to adopt new legislation.

I should again like to draw the attention of this chamber to the fact that, on February 14, 1983, one year and three months ago, they admitted that this was illegal. At the outset, we did not press them too hard. Even when we wrote to them in January, we gave the minister all kinds of time to correct the situation. In that connection, I should like to read from the last paragraph of the report I presented yesterday evening in the Senate, which I think is relevant to this situation. It states:

In making this report, your Committee's purpose is to impress upon the Government the need for speedy legislative action. In this connection, your Committee feels free to suggest that the necessary legislation might conveniently be introduced in the Senate. In our view,—

I would remind honourable senators that this is a joint committee—

—the number of legislative proposals that are regularly introduced in the House of Commons makes it eminently practical to introduce in the Upper Chamber minor legislative amendments of a technical nature that are non-controversial and do not involve the expenditure of public monies.

The one I am speaking of today is a perfect example. There is no excuse whatsoever for the Minister of Agriculture to do what he is doing. If the government would only use the Senate, it could get these things through very quickly. This is not a controversial matter. If everyone agrees on the merits, a bill legalizing the matter could be introduced in the Senate, a Senate committee could study it, and it could breeze through the House of Commons without any difficulty at all.

What this chamber has to do is not slough this off to one side—because I am moving the adoption of this report—but we must, by supporting the adoption of this report, show that we do not approve of ministers acting illegally.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I shall not detain the chamber long because I merely want to say that, personally speaking, I have followed the activities of this committee from the days of former Senator Eugene Forsey to the régime of my honourable friend who has just spoken. I have followed it with admiration and appreciation because I think this committee does a very good job. The work is arduous and, in a sense, dry but, nevertheless, of really significant importance. That fact has been illustrated no better than in the report my friend has made this afternoon with respect to this completely unjustified flouting of our constitutional system by the Minister of Agriculture.

I join with those who reprobate conduct of this kind, particularly when it is so completely unnecessary. If there is a mistake in the law or if there is a void that needs to be filled, there is nothing to prevent that from being done and to make matters legal and proper through the correct parliamentary institutions.

I should like to congratulate the committee and Senator Godfrey for making an extremely practical suggestion on how that can be done, that is, to have the bill introduced in this house. We know that, in the parliamentary machine as a whole, things get tied up, and it is hard for legislation to make its way through the House of Commons and reach us, but it is a lot simpler, a good deal easier and, sometimes, more effective to have legislation start here and make its way to the House of Commons so that they have a clear proposition they can dispose of in quick order.

I think my friend has made a splendid suggestion, that is, that there should be a bill introduced in the Senate to supply the legal foundation for what the Minister of Agriculture is now doing quite illegally. I suggest to the Leader of the House that he give this some thought. If he wishes to produce a bill of that kind, I think I can say for my colleagues and myself that we will give it prompt support, so there will be no question of delay so far as this house is concerned, and the matter can proceed to the House of Commons.

If he does not want to do that, then if the chairman of the committee wants to submit his own bill in respect of this matter—and if we find that it is constitutionally proper for him to do so—the same support will be rendered.

I would thank my honourable friend for the work of his committee. I thank him for his report, and I thank him for his sound advice. Speaking for myself, I intend to take it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in moving the adjournment of the debate on this order, I ought to say that I too was struck by the report, Senator Godfrey's observations about it and his suggestion for a solution. When I move adjournment of the debate, I hope he will not think that I am going to sit on the matter because I am going to take it up with the government and hope that we can carry on with his and the committee's suggestion.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

AFFAIRS OF THE AGED

MOTION TO ESTABLISH DIVISION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Benidickson, P.C.:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the establishment of a Division of the Affairs of the Aged, with responsibility, insofar as the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, for promoting the welfare of aged people in Canada by

- (i) planning and helping to plan Government of Canada policies on the affairs of the aged, in particular, in the areas of human rights, income security, employment, retirement and public services, including housing, nutrition, health care, education and recreation;
- (ii) administering such Acts of the Parliament of Canada and such orders and regulations of the Government of Canada as are assigned to it;
- (iii) coordinating policies, in both the public and private sectors, affecting the aged;
- (iv) carrying out research and dispensing information on the affairs of the aged; and
- (v) engaging in such other activities as are considered conducive to this goal by the Governor-in-Council.—
(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, since it has been quite some time since this motion was last discussed, I will read it to you in order to refresh your memories. The motion proposed by Senator Croll states:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the establishment of a Division of the Affairs of the Aged, with responsibility, insofar as the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, for promoting the welfare of aged people in Canada by

- (i) planning and helping to plan Government of Canada policies on the affairs of the aged, in particular, in the areas of human rights, income security, employment, retirement and public services, including housing, nutrition, health care, education and recreation;
- (ii) administering such Acts of the Parliament of Canada and such orders and regulations of the Government of Canada as are assigned to it;
- (iii) coordinating policies, in both the public and private sectors, affecting the aged;
- (iv) carrying out research and dispensing information on the affairs of the aged; and
- (v) engaging in such other activities as are considered conducive to this goal by the Governor-in-Council.

● (1510)

Honourable senators, before making a few comments in support of the motion, I want to compliment and congratulate Senator Croll for proposing this motion at this particular time, and I emphasize the words "at this particular time" because I believe they constitute an important reason for supporting the motion. I believe that, with the government so preoccupied and concerned about economic problems, the difficulties faced by our older citizens may well be overlooked or given a low priority and that the solution to the problems of our older people—especially their financial problems—may well be postponed until more favourable economic times.

Honourable senators, I recognize, of course, that the concern at all levels of government in Canada—federal, provincial and municipal—is directed towards the great evil of the present time, which is the high rate of unemployment, especially among our youth. It is only reasonable that the concentration of government policies should be directed towards trying to find solutions or partial solutions to the problem of unemployment and the social evils that follow from and, indeed, accompany it. While recognizing this, we must also recognize that there is an ever-present danger that the distressing conditions of many of the elderly—their difficult living conditions—may be put aside, as it were, to await better economic times.

Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Croll is performing a real service to the elderly by bringing forth this motion at this time. He is making sure that we all remember our continuing obligation and responsibility to the aged in our society. That obligation and responsibility must not be forgotten or overlooked, regardless of the fact that other age groups require and, indeed, demand attention. Knowing that it is not likely that any new benefits which may be costly can be expected at this time, Senator Croll's motion does not call for any large additional expenditures. In fact, it calls for a better utilization of existing programs. Indeed, one of the actions suggested by the motion is the co-ordinating of policies in both the public and private sectors affecting the aged. If the proposals contained in the motion are put into effect, I think it would be of real assistance to the aged—especially to those coming under the various programs for the first time, and to all those whose circumstances have changed since they first became eligible for the various benefits available to them.

Honourable senators, the needs of the aged are very real. Their economic, social and emotional needs must be of concern to all Canadians. May I say here, honourable senators, that the poor, the aged and the disadvantaged in our society have and have had for many years, in the person of Senator Croll, a tireless advocate and a strong voice speaking on their behalf in the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Macdonald: When presenting his motion, the honourable senator used some interesting statistics. I think that a study of these statistics is a further and powerful, though silent, argument in favour of the motion. I think the needs of the elderly cannot be considered in isolation, as it were. The conditions of the poor and of the working poor form part of the whole unhappy situation. In the course of time, they, too, will come under our programs for the elderly.

Honourable senators, while recognizing that much remains to be done for the elderly in Canada, we must also recognize that a great deal has already been done to assist them. I noticed in the report on old age security that, in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983, the amount of $9,643,033,511 was paid in total to the 2,425,685 Old Age Security pensioners, and that, of this amount, the sum of $2,416,263,142 was paid in the supplement to the Old Age Security to 1,250,852 pensioners, and $221,468,535 of the total amount was paid to recipients of the Spouses Allowance. In spite of the great amounts of money which have been paid out under the various programs to those over 65, we are still confronted with poverty among those under that age. How widespread that poverty is I do not know, and it is difficult to obtain exact figures.

Some time ago, I noticed a report in the Toronto Star of February 21 last, which report dealt with a new study by the Metro Social Planning Council. It stated that about 363,000 Ontario children under the age of 15 were living in poverty. It further stated that the number of children below the poverty line soared by 30 per cent between 1981 and 1982. The story mentioned that these figures were obtained by extracting Ontario figures from country-wide statistics for those two years compiled by Statistics Canada. I remind honourable senators that the poverty line of Statistics Canada is a lower one than that established by the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. As honourable senators know, there are various poverty lines which vary as to the income considered necessary to support single persons, married persons without dependents and married persons with different sized families. There is an interesting study on this subject entitled "1984 Poverty Lines, Estimates by the National Council of Welfare, March, 1984." This is a Government of Canada publication. All in all, honourable senators, I think that the poverty line established by the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, updated through 1982, tells the story in a clear and concise way. It shows that much has been accomplished over the years since the report on poverty was published, but it also shows that what remains to be done presents a tremendous challenge to the Canadian people.

Honourable senators, when talking about unemployment and poverty in general, I know that I am not speaking strictly to the motion, but I think it is all part of the general economic pattern. I will give another example of what I mean. In the January 30 issue of Maclean's magazine there was an article entitled: "Canada's Forgotten Poor." It is well worth reading and I will quote one paragraph from it:

In 1981, according to Statistics Canada, 3.5 million Canadians were living within the definition of poverty. In 1982, the number jumped to 4.1 million; the 1983 figures will not be available until the fall but will be roughly 4.4 million.

The quotation continues:

● (1520)

After a dozen years of decline poverty has returned in earnest, largely because of unemployment and now a jobless economic recovery threatens to make poverty a lasting legacy of the great recession.

Honourable senators, it is terrible to think that there may be a hard core of permanent unemployment as a legacy of the recession; yet this may very well be the case.

In the Globe and Mail report on business, in its April 20 issue, an article by Peter Cook mentioned this situation. I will quote one paragraph from that interesting article. It said:

The phenomenon of a still expanding economy that seems able to generate increases in factory orders and production but not in jobs is puzzling for economists.

Honourable senators, as I mentioned, I believe this is a very timely motion brought forward by the honourable senator. It is not asking for very much and I am personally glad to support it. Indeed, I hope that before too long a bill will come to us to establish a division for the affairs of the aged, and I will be happy to support it.

Before closing, I wish again to congratulate Senator Croll and to compliment him not only for bringing forth this motion at this time, but also for his lifetime concern for the poor and the elderly, and for his dedication in working to improve the lot of the poor, the elderly and the disadvantaged.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS

MOTION RE INVITATION TO PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John M. Godfrey, pursuant to notice of April 17, 1984, moved:

That whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by the Committee of the Senate in which in the opinion of such Committee, a province or provinces have a special interest, then as a general policy, the government of such province or provinces where in the opinion of the Committee it is practicable to do so, shall be asked by the Committee as to whether or not they wish to make written and/or verbal representations to the Committee, and any province that replies in the affirmative shall be given a reasonable opportunity to do so.

He said: Honourable senators, I will be as brief as possible. This motion has been under discussion for six long years.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Not in its present form.

Senator Godfrey: That is right, and I will explain. This motion is slightly different from the one that I moved last year. In this motion I have inserted the words "which in the opinion of such Committee" before "a province or provinces have a special interest"; and the words "where in the opinion of the Committee" before "it is practicable to do so". I included those words so that there is no doubt it is the committee that makes the decisions as to whether the province has a special interest and whether it is practicable to invite them to appear.

This first came under discussion six years ago in connection with the Committee on Reform of the Senate, which was chaired by Senator Stanbury. We had long discussions about this. That committee did not actually make a report. However, I did refer to the consensus of the committee, which was in line with this motion. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, under the chairmanship of Senator Goldenberg, vigorously resisted any suggestion I made that the provinces should be invited to appear before that committee. I went back to the committee and got its authority to tell Senator Goldenberg that it was the opinion of the committee that that should be done. Senator Goldenberg reluctantly agreed and at that time we invited the provinces. I have forgotten the name of the actual bill the committee was considering at that time.

On February 23, 1982, I wrote a letter to Senator Perrault in connection with this subject. I have referred to this letter many times. It was in connection with a suggestion that we hold a meeting of committee chairmen. In that letter I said:

One area in which the Senate has been criticized is whether or not it is properly performing its function to represent the regions. I can recall long discussions on this subject in the Senate Committee on the Constitution, chaired by Senator Stanbury, in 1978. One of the conclusions we reached informally was that the Senate Committees should all adopt a policy that whenever a bill or a subject was being considered that affected Provinces, the Provincial Governments always be asked if they wished to make representations to the Committee.

We had a meeting of chairmen of committees but we never reached the subject I had proposed. It was eventually discussed at a meeting held on November 4, 1982, and the memorandum from the director of committees calling the meeting referred to the prestudy of bills, human rights questions, enabling clauses of bills, and investigative work of committees.

As a result of that meeting, I withdrew the motion, because we had a general consensus of committee chairmen that it was desirable that committees should follow that practice. I said I would withdraw the motion and see how it worked out. It worked out very well. After a few months I decided that having pretty well established the practice, we should be official about it and get the official approval of the Senate so that we could demonstrate to the public that we were taking an interest and representing provincial interests.

Therefore I again moved the motion. Again it was discussed at a committee meeting as to whether or not we should adopt the motion. One of the objections raised was "Who is going to decide whether the provinces have a special interest and whether it is practicable?" I took the objections into account in the wording of this motion. I wrote to Senator Frith last year saying that I was prepared to amend the motion to include those words I have referred to earlier.

I received a letter from Senator Roblin as follows. He said:

Dear Senator Godfrey,

I am concerned about the motion on the provinces outlined in your memorandum of May 25th last.

The thrust of your idea is undoubtedly unexceptional; that is that the Senate should go out of its way to make itself available to provincial representations.

The advisability however of enshrining the idea in a Senate resolution requires some thought. There is no intention of reaching for a jurisdiction which does not belong to us but there is a possibility that provinces might regard a resolution on the subject as a work of supererogation.

It therefore seems unnecessary to formalize the matter in the form you suggest and that we may rely on committee chairmen and their committees to exercise their discretion.

I shall now read my reply dated June 8, 1983:

When I received your letter I dove for my Concise Oxford Dictionary to find out what supererogation meant. It is defined there as "pay out beyond what is expected" and "doing of more than duty requires". I am really puzzled as to why you are of the opinion that the provinces would think there is something wrong with that.

While all of the present Chairmen may agree with you "that the Senate should go out of its way to make itself available to provincial representations", there is no guarantee that this will be the attitude of future Chairmen. Formalizing the matter might be of some use for future reference, and I cannot think of what harm it could possibly do.

One advantage, of course, would be to demonstrate at this time that the Senate is aware of the almost universal criticisms it has received, because of its lack of action, in the area of regional representation and is making a conscious effort to do something about it.

• (1530)

I would like to talk about the effectiveness of Senate committees, particularly as it relates to statements that have been made in this chamber recently. For instance, Senator Roblin said just last evening, as it is recorded in Hansard at page 567; "When did we last amend a government bill in committee?" The question is not just whether the Senate amended the bill but whether it caused the bill to be amended. I was here for some time before I realized how the system works. It is almost more important that the Senate committee persuade the government to amend the bill than to amend it itself. In other words, if we can convince the government on a certain position, the government will propose an amendment to the Senate committee which will eventually be adopted and appear in the legislation. This approach is just as effective as if the Senate went ahead and amended the bill itself without reference to the government.

Senator Frith: It is probably more effective.

Senator Godfrey: Yes. However, very few people realize that such amendments proposed by the government were instigated as a result of pressure from the committee and negotiations by the committee chairmen.

I would like to refer to some bills which have been amended in the manner I have just described. My first example is Bill S-32, which involved mandatory supervision. I recall that the government decided to amend the original bill by providing for gating. The members of the committee were concerned about the question of human rights, an issue to which I feel the Senate should always be alert. We felt that it should not be up to the Parole Board alone to decide, after an inmate has served two-thirds of his sentence, whether he should serve the remaining one-third. We felt that such a decision should follow the due process of law and be made in the courts. This view was resisted by the minister. Subsequently we held a meeting in camera. I shall repeat only what I said at that meeting. I said that if there is anything we should stand firm upon as a matter of principle and as a matter of human rights, it is this matter and that if the Senate is going to mean anything, it has to stand firm on this issue. The next day the minister came along with an amendment that agreed with everything we had said. I had not realized it but at the time sitting behind me was a representative from the minister's office. Obviously, she went back to the minister and told him what I had said and that we meant business, with the result that the bill was amended. The bill did not proceed any further but I understand that it is being re-introduced in the other place with the same amendment. Another example was the bill which restricted government bodies to 10 per cent ownership in transportation companies. The majority of the members of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee took violent exception to the provisions of the bill. For instance, we could not see why it should apply to government bodies when a very minor inter-provincial trucking company was involved or a Canadian controlled international steamship line, when most such lines were owned outright by foreigners. The government paid attention to the committee's report and went part way towards accepting the recommendations we had suggested. The minister came to see me because it was felt that I would be the one to cause trouble because I did not think they had gone far enough. After considering some of the amendments, I told them so in no uncertain terms. The result was that the bill was withdrawn.

Another example is the tax treaty bills. A couple of years ago a tax treaty bill was introduced with a completely unacceptable method for disallowance motions. It provided that the treaty could be amended by regulation and that, in effect you could thereby increase taxation by regulation. The committee objected and the government came forth with an amendment that did not go quite as far as the committee wanted, but it was a reasonable compromise. In fact, after the Senate rises today, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will be considering a similar bill in the form of Bill S-11. We have already had one meeting on this bill and again there was the question of changing treaties by regulation. I can only say that the committee objected to the absence of disallowance procedures and dumped all over the officials who presented the bill and, I am told, that there will be amendments proposed by the government which will satisfy the committee's objections.

I would like to refer to a speech made by Senator Asselin, again on the subject of the effectiveness of committees, which is relevant to the idea of whether we can properly represent the provinces by the work that is done in committees. He said at page 443 of the Debates of the Senate:

The Senate does have a fair number of standing committees and, each time they sit, we find it difficult to ensure that they all have a quorum. In addition, whenever a subject a little unusual comes up, the reaction is to set up a special committee. There are people in the Senate who want to build their own little empires. We have seen that often in the past. I am not referring to Senator Hébert, because he has just joined us. But we did see some senators who were very fond of chairing their own little committee. I am not saying that the questions under consideration were not important, but surely they could just as easily have been examined by the standing Senate committees.

At page 445, he said:

It would mean that the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs would only be asked to consider legislation. For anything else, a special committee would be set up, a senator would be empowered to build his own little empire and conduct a year-long study of a problem which a regular committee could examine.

We in this house owe a great deal to those senators who build their own little empires. It is really quite outrageous that the honourable senator should react in that way when he looks at all the work done by special investigative committees, such as those chaired by Senator Croll. I don't think I need say any more than that. I would like to refer to one other statement that the honourable senator made. He said that practically all reports submitted by any committee of which he was a member were completely ignored. I do not know whether they were ignored because he was a member but certainly other reports have not been ignored.

I would like to refer to a speech made in 1974 by Senator Croll. He instigated research on how the recommendations of his committee on aging has been handled by the government and the effectiveness of the whole process. I would like to read two short extracts from that speech. I would refer honourable senators to the research document called "Report on the Action Taken on the Recommendation of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, 1966." As is reported in Senate Debates at page 146, 1974, Senator Croll said:

In the course of our recommendations, of which there were 92, we came up with a blockbuster, for the first recommendation we made in our report was to reduce the age for Old Age Security from 70 to 65 and to provide a basic income. The government accepted it within a very short time.

At page 147, he said:

Let me give you the box score—and I shall put it in the parlance of baseball rather than hockey, which is kind of dangerous around this place. In any event, it will be understood. It is as follows: Ninety-two recommendations—92 times at bat; 25 home runs; 54 singles, doubles or triples. Thirteen times struck out, but swinging.

That is not a bad record. Senator Croll continued to be very curious about how report recommendations were handled. As reported in Hansard, June 21, 1976, page 2238, he instigated an inquiry which reads in part:

What specific action, if any, has been taken in implementation of each of the following principal recommendations contained in the Fifth Report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Consumer Credit and Cost of Living,—

He lists 16 recommendations to which Senator Langlois referred showing that most of them had been accepted by the government.

● (1540)

The next day, Senator Croll returned to the attack asking what had happened to the committee recommendations dealing with the issue of penitentiaries. Senator Perrault replied stating that most of them had been accepted by the government.

To bring my examples more up to date, the National Finance Committee in its dealings with the report on manpower made 57 recommendations, some 52 of which were adopted by the government.

The National Finance Committee dealt with the question of government accommodation and the main report recommended revenue dependency. In other words, it was the position of the government that the departments should rent accommodation which they use. That, again, is a recommendation which has been accepted by the government in principle.

Of course, we all know the great work the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee has been doing, which is something highly respected. Yet, some senators refer to committee chairmen who have shown real initiative as being in the game to build their own little empire. All I can say is, "Shame on you!" What we need is more initiative of the type recently displayed by Senators Hébert and Watt—not less. We need more committee work—not less. We need more days such as last Tuesday when eight committees met, two at a time in their allotted time slots without any problems whatsoever with respect to quorums, even though the Senate was not sitting.

As I pointed out, Senator Flynn asked a question with respect to whether the provinces today would be invited to appear before a certain Senate committee. Also, as I pointed out, if this motion had been passed in the last session he would never have had to ask the question.

To move to my own motion, let us have some action with respect to it. Six years is long enough to wait. Let us go on record as approving the principle of this motion. Let us not pussyfoot around any more—the future of the Senate is at stake. Undoubtedly, the Senate will be changed; however, in the meantime let us demonstrate that the present Senate is serious with respect to representing the interests of the provinces and that we have officially approved an effective mechanism for doing so.

Please, Senator Frith, do not adjourn this motion—or, even worse, have someone else adjourn it and then sit on it as you did in the last session of Parliament without allowing the Senate a chance to vote on it.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to ask a question of the honourable senator? As I understood him in his opening remarks, he set out to answer the point made by Senator Roblin yesterday when he asked when had the Senate ever amended a government bill. Senator Godfrey then set out to give some examples to prove that Senator Roblin was wrong. However, it seems to me that we are talking about two different things. I believe Senator Roblin was referring to bills which originate in the House of Commons; whereas Senator Godfrey went into a long dissertation to prove that Senate bills have been amended from their original form and that the government has accepted those amendments. I thought that he might have gone on to say also that through the committee system we have amended bills via the pre-study method, but unless it has escaped me, I have not heard one example which illustrates that a bill originating in the House of Commons has been amended in the Senate.

Senator Godfrey: When Senator Roblin asked the question he did not just refer to bills originally introduced in the House of Commons. However, Senator Bosa, you are quite right; there is a distinction which is why I have been so keen with respect to the pre-study procedure. This was a procedure originally initiated by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee back in 1970, and it became known as the Hayden formula. I never understood why other committee chairmen were reluctant to follow that committee's example. The pre-study has been an effective means of getting our amendments across in a non-adversarial way. If a Senate committee sits first, sends recommendations to the government and the appropriate House of Commons committee before it gets into its study, then the government can bring the amendments suggested before the House of Commons committee if it feels the recommendations make sense. We do not receive any credit for that. In fact, few people realize how the system works—but it does work. By the time a Commons bill reaches the Senate it is generally too late to make amendments although there have been exceptions. The Banking, Trade and Commerce committee has had numerous meetings with respect to subject matter, which is why I suggested in my letter to Senator Perrault some two years ago that the committee chairmen should meet and study the question of pre-study. Shortly before that time, I was surprised to find out that this procedure was not being used by the committees. I had presumed it was being used generally, however, I discovered it was not. Today, Senate committees are using the pre-study method more and more.

Furthermore, with respect to the criticism about Christmas closure, the Senate could have conducted a pre-study with respect to most of the bills. In fact, we did this last fall. We changed the system whereby we can effectively look at the subject matter of a bill. We have made some progress in that respect.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to assist Senator Godfrey in the guise of a question. Does the honourable senator recall in relation to the question put by Senator Bosa, two occasions which come to my mind immediately, one in 1977, when the then Minister of Transport brought in the Air Canada Act? At that time, the Senate committee had the minister appear, and we urged him to make certain changes to provisions in the bill which were totally unacceptable to the Senate. These were provisions which went just too far in delegating authority which should remain with Parliament. The minister was rather obdurate. He was told that unless he accepted our changes and saw that they were passed in the House of Commons his bill would not pass; in effect, we would leave it in committee. He accepted that and the amendments were made.

I recall another situation in which the same minister was involved. This time we were dealing with the Maritime Code Act, a rather famous piece of legislation. I believe the Senate sat for something in the order of four weeks during the summer recess. Is that not correct, Senator Macdonald?

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Yes, that is correct.

Senator McElman: We did an absolutely superb job with respect to that legislation. As a matter of fact, we rewrote the bill, making some 130 amendments to it before sending it back to the Commons. The minister was so embarrassed that he would not reintroduce the bill. He waited for a new session in which he brought back our bill and said not a word about what the Senate had done with respect to it.

Those are just two classic cases in which the Senate has done a superb job.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senator, I overlooked those cases. Of course, there are other instances in which the government has withdrawn a bill after a Senate committee has criticized it. We do not amend it so much as the government does after we have objected, and objected strenuously. The bill dealing with the proposed Canadian Security Intelligence Service is a perfect example of this type of situation. That bill was a Commons bill on which we conducted a pre-study in the Senate. The government accepted 95 per cent of our recommendations, which we made not in an adversarial way or a confrontational way, because our amendments made sense.

Speaking from my own experience as a member of that committee, I do not think one member of the committee could have brought in as good a report on their own as that committee did as a body. There was much discussion and changing of ideas and we moulded those ideas into a consensus which in the end made a great deal of sense, both politically and practically.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will move the adjournment of the debate. However, I do not intend to sit on it, as Senator Godfrey says. In fact, I will tell honourable senators right now that I will speak to it and I will make four points.

The first point I make is that I agree with Senator Godfrey that there is an extremely important distinction to be drawn between the Senate amending a bill and the Senate causing a bill to be amended. The examples given by Senators Godfrey and McElman are good illustrations of this point. In fact, these illustrations continue. This afternoon I will be appearing on behalf of the government before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, withdrawing the provisions objected to by the Senate committee. We had meetings with representatives of the government on this matter. I received a letter the other day from a representative of the government saying that it was prepared to withdraw the objectionable provisions. The practice of causing amendments to be made, while it is not taking place every week is certainly followed on a regular basis.

Senator McElman: We did amend the Air Canada legislation.

Senator Frith: That is exactly right, Senator McElman. In some cases we made actual amendments. I feel we must remember those distinctions, and I agree with Senator Godfrey about that.

My second point is that I wish to consult the committee chairmen with respect to this form before I make an intervention.

My third point is that I will want to make a distinction between our duty, as I see it, as senators to represent regions and provinces, because we are all provincial senators, and representing provincial governments. I will want to elaborate on that point, making reference to the issue raised in the first part of what has become known as the Lamontagne committee report; that is, that essentially the interface between the provincial and federal governments should be governmental rather than legislative. In other words, there is a role for us to play in representing the provinces, which does not mean we will be representing the provincial governments.

● (1550)

Finally, I will be asking honourable senators to consider whether we would better demonstrate the principles raised by Senator Godfrey by proceeding as we have been doing more recently, and I give him credit for helping to bring this about, than we would by passing a resolution.

Honourable senators, those are the points I will want to discuss. I will not be "sitting on it" but will be standing to talk about it in due course. With those preliminary comments, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 24, 1984

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.
Prayers.

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-11, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE OFFSHORE APPLICATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-16, to apply the customs and excise jurisdiction of Canada to the continental shelf of Canada and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, May 29, 1984.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TAX CONVENTION BILL, 1984

FIRST READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government) presented Bill S-14, to implement a convention between Canada and the United States with respect to taxes on income and on capital.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, May 29, 1984.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Lowell Murray, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs, presented the following report:

Thursday, May 24, 1984

The Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs has the honour to present its

FIRST REPORT

In accordance with its Orders of Reference from the Senate dated May 8, May 9 and May 22, 1984, and its Orders of Reference from the House of Commons dated May 4 and May 16, 1984, your Committee recommends that it be empowered to hire professional, clerical and stenographic staff as may be required.

Respectfully submitted,

LOWELL MURRAY
Joint Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Murray: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I believe the first report speaks for itself. It is a completely routine matter. The next step will be for the committee to prepare a budget for staff, which would have to meet the approval of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, I would ask the indulgence of the Senate. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has a report on Bill S-11, but unfortunately the report is somewhere between the committee clerk's office and the Senate and has been for the last two and a half hours. I expect to receive it shortly. Later today I will ask leave to revert to Reports of Committees.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO REVIEW
CANADIAN HEALTH CARE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, May 29, 1984, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to review all aspects of, and make recommendations on, an overall Canadian health care policy;

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place; and

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL FROM PLACE TO PLACE IN CANADA

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, May 29, 1984, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on April 4, 1984, to examine the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985, be empowered to travel from place to place within Canada for the purpose of such examination;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than November 1, 1984.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 29, 1984, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

SENATE REFORM

REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate.

For some time now, the Minister of Justice has been traveling from province to province, to meet the Attorneys General and submit to them the report on changes that should be made in the Senate of Canada. Considering that the subject has been on the agenda in the Senate and that debate on the subject has yet to begin in the other place, does the Minister of Justice, Mr. MacGuigan, intend, on behalf of the Canadian Government, to introduce shortly legislation that would reflect the views of the report by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on changes to be made in the Senate?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, according to my information, the answer is no, but I shall take the question as notice and find out whether or not I was right.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government) for Hon. Hazen Argue, moved the third reading of Bill C-23, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Thériault, seconded by the Honourable Senator Le Moine, for the second reading of the Bill C-4, intituled: "An Act to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act".—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am pleased to respond to Senator Thériault's motion for second reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. As usual the honourable senator expressed himself with sincerity on an aspect of fisheries with which he has had long experience in his area of Atlantic Canada, which with other eastern provinces, has suffered from fishery problems. I can understand the problem he has had with American fishermen from the State of Maine, who pay the small fines, but since their catch is usually of a greater value, the fines are not much of a deterrent. I am sure that as a result of this bill the fines will be increased, and this might deter American fishermen from fishing in the offshore waters of New Brunswick.

Bill C-4 is simply a redraft of Bill C-8 that was introduced in April, 1980 but died on the Order Paper. Its purpose, as expressed by Senator Thériault, is to raise the level of fines and penalties for violation of the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act and thereby restrict the activities of foreign fishing vessels in Canadian waters. For the record, it is worthwhile mentioning a few of the activities that will be prohibited under the legislation. They include fishing or preparing fish, the unloading of fish or supplies, the taking of marine plants, and the obtaining of bait and other supplies.

Of course, all of those activities, as well as others, can be authorized by Governor in Council and regulated under permits or licences. I mention that, because that is what is happening now, and as we raise the level of fines and sentences of imprisonment against foreign fishing vessels, we are inviting those same foreign vessels back into our waters by having joint ventures and over-the-side sales negotiations and agreements. In other words, we are selling them our raw product, unprocessed, and losing jobs in our plants, leaving plant workers idle or on Unemployment Insurance. The following is one statistic to emphasize this curious situation. In 1980 we made direct sales to foreign vessels of 22,530 tonnes. In 1981 it increased threefold to 61,743 tonnes; in 1982 it increased by 50 per cent to 91,135 tonnes; and in 1983 it was 60,252 tonnes. The last figures are only preliminary ones and do not represent the whole year's sale.

● (1410)

So, with the greatest of respect to Senator Argue and his intervention yesterday indicating that he was willing to help sell our fish through the possible introduction of a fish marketing agency, in my humble opinion that is not the solution to the problem. The problem itself lies in the fact that the government never paid enough attention to the fisheries. Rather than providing leadership in its management and marketing, and rather than improving the handling and quality in order to get a better price for the fishermen, the government neglected that industry. After altering licences to get the most out of the product over the years, we are now blundering along in a haphazard manner instead of being world leaders in the fishing industry. We are now trying to prevent another drastic failure or collapse in an industry which should be one of our most prosperous.

Honourable senators, we can pass this bill easily through all stages today, but we are only locking the door after it is too late. The attitude of the government is so obvious that it must be redressed. When a simple bill was ready for introduction four years ago, it was not brought forward. I can only ask, why was it not introduced then? It would have had more meaning at that time and could have provided a deterrent.

[Senator Marshall.]

The bill may give the government a feeling that it is flexing its muscles by invoking stringent measures to deny foreign vessels the right to fish illegally in Canadian waters, but as it implements, on the one hand, these restrictions to keep them out, the minister is entering into negotiations, on the other, to invite them into our waters.

For example, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans proudly announced recently a new fishing agreement with the USSR when answering a question put to him on that subject in the other place. Under that agreement, the USSR will purchase $12 million worth of our fish products while they are, at the same time, permitted to catch an estimated 50 million dollars' worth of groundfish off the Newfoundland coast. The minister's reply to protests was that the Newfoundland government did not object. How absurd can one get? On the one hand, the minister jealously guards federal jurisdiction over fisheries and denies joint management with the provinces, yet he blames the Province of Newfoundland because they did not object to the agreement.

That reminds me of the story of the chap who murdered his mother and father and when he went before the court pleaded for mercy on the grounds that he was an orphan!

But the telling point of another part of his reply was that the resource he was selling and allowing the Russians to catch was surplus to our needs and was of a species that Canadians are not interested in catching. To my mind there is no fish that would not be caught if there were some leadership shown by the government. One wonders why the Russians are buying those fish if they are not of any value.

Here we are, honourable senators, cutting off licences to fishermen because of a lack of the resource; we are inflicting quotas on our own fishermen; we are restricting fishermen from entering certain waters because of a lack of the resource; we are cutting the season on certain species because of a shortage of the resource; we have invoked a 200-mile limit to keep foreign dragnets out of our waters; and in this bill we are increasing the fines and penalties.

Processing plants are lying idle because of bad distribution or a lack of fish. We just poured $75 million into a bankrupt industry, and I will guarantee you that within five years we will have to pour more millions of dollars into that same industry.

Thousands of fishermen and plant workers are idle because of ice conditions and because they are waiting for the slow process of providing ice-breakers to allow them to earn their livelihood instead of collecting UIC benefits. We hear, until we are sick of it, that there are too many fishermen in Canada chasing too few fish. Yet, despite the continuous warning that our fish stocks are depleting and the fact that we deny our fishermen the God-given right to exploit the resource to the best of their ability, we suddenly find ample stocks to give or sell to the very nations that have raped our fish stocks and plundered our spawning grounds while our own fishermen watch and wonder why.

We invoked a 200-mile limit after the plundering and raping took place. Then the fishermen were told to wait until the stocks were replenished, and they are still waiting. Senator Thériault dwelt extensively on the dramatic increase in the fines imposed on foreign vessels which violate our laws, within our 200-mile zone, under subsection 3(2). Fines will be raised from $25,000 to $100,000 on an indictable conviction, and from $5,000 to $25,000 on summary conviction. That is the extent of the bill before us.

Despite my objections and comments on the overall fishery, I see no reason to delay the bill. I am sure that with the restrictions imposed it will provide a deterrent. Unless the acting leader and my whip listen to the advice I have been giving, I have no objections to the bill going to committee. I see no reason at the present time why it should not go through all stages.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Thériault speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I have listened attentively to the remarks of Senator Marshall. He made some good points even though he spoke in generalities. Of course, as a supporter of the Conservative Party and having been in opposition for so long, he has no choice—

Hon. C. William Doody: Don't be nasty now.

Senator Thériault: —other than to be negative. I consider that as part of his problem and accept the criticisms with grace.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Amazing grace!

Senator Thériault: Yesterday the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board rose to ask a question and went on to make a statement expressing his opinion on how the marketing of the fishing industry should be handled in this country. I agree with his statements to some degree. My problem is that, while on the prairies farmers have been known as the great defenders of private enterprise, they almost constantly make that representation with their hand in the till of the federal government, whereas on the east coast every time the people involved in the fisheries ask the government to rescue them by providing a pittance of assistance, they are accused of being socialists. If I may reflect out loud, I think that the fishery—the fishermen and the producers—could take a lesson from the western farmers and the entire agricultural industry of this country. I hope that before too long we can do this.

• (1420)

Speaking personally, I would not have objected if part of the restructuring of the fishing industry, which has been taking place over the last year and which is still taking place, had not created these monsters, these half private, half government corporations. I agree with my colleague from Newfoundland that these giants will be back to the government asking for more funds before too long. The problem is exactly as Senator

Marshall has put it. To some degree he has good reason to say some of the things he has said. It all boils down to a question of marketing.

Two giant corporations in Nova Scotia, and at least two or three in Newfoundland, after realizing there was to be an extension of the 200-mile limit, bought every small company they could. These giants became involved in boat construction programs and went into debt to certain banks. They were reaching for a golden nugget in the sky and ended up in disastrous financial positions. At the same time, in New Brunswick, a great number of small family-owned businesses were making money. Although I am not the greatest proponent of private enterprise, I do believe that had the industry in the Atlantic provinces been left alone then people in the small communities would have been able to get organized. They would have been able to get back into business with probably less assistance than that which was given through the restructuring program. The so-called giants should have been left to go bankrupt.

Honourable senators, I am pleased that members on the opposition side of the house are willing to pass this bill. There is nothing bad about it. I do not know how this is done in the Senate but I will do it my way. With the unanimous consent of the house I move that we have third reading of this bill now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we do it somewhat slower in the Senate than they do it in New Brunswick—but not by much. I believe what we need now is to have the motion put for second reading of the bill and then Senator Thériault can ask for third reading.

Senator Thériault: It is rather funny, but I never thought I would see the day when I would learn that you need second reading before third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Thériault: I suppose there is a rule which I must cite if I want to move that the bill be read a third time immediately. However, I will return to what I said before. With unanimous consent of the Senate I move that this bill be now read a third time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: No. The reason I say no is because of the language my honourable colleague used in calling us all ignorant because we are members of the opposition. Because of that he does not deserve any favours.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I do not know how my honourable colleague understood such a thing. I never said such a thing, especially not of my good friend Senator Marshall. I cannot say the same for all opposition senators, but after having listened to Senator Marshall I would never use such language. I might change my mind if it had been somebody else speaking.

Now that unanimous consent has not been granted, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day to be read a third time at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce presented the following report:

Thursday, May 24, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Tunisia, Canada and the People's Republic of Bangladesh, Canada and the United Republic of Cameroon and Canada and the Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka, an agreement between Canada and Kenya and conventions between Canada and the Arab Republic of Egypt, Canada and the Republic of the Ivory Coast and Canada and Sweden for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax", has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, April 4, 1984, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendment:

Pages 7 8 and 9: Strike out clauses 28 and 29 and the headings immediately preceding those clauses.

Respectfully submitted,

A. IRVINE BARROW
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, I have some explanation in connection with these amendments. The clauses which the committee has deleted refer to powers of the government to amend the bill itself without reference to Parliament. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee took exception to these saying that if this bill were to be amended then it should come back before the Senate and before Parliament. As a result of representations that were made to the government, the government has decided to amend the bill by deleting those clauses.

[Senator Thériault.]

Therefore, honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be now read the third time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill C-11, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to be limited in my time today since I do not like making long speeches at any rate. Bill C-11 is, essentially, of a technical nature. Its main provisions relate to the accounting methods followed by the Exchange Fund Account in valuing Canada's gold reserves and recording gains on gold transactions. The amendments also broaden the provisions under which the Minister of Finance can engage in gold transactions, make minor clarifying adjustments to the wording of the act and shorten its title to the Currency Act.

As a result of developments following the abandonment of an official price for gold by the International Monetary Fund in 1978, the Auditor General has raised questions about some provisions of the Currency and Exchange Act. Specifically, beginning with his audit of the Exchange Fund Account for 1979, the Auditor General has noted that the policy of valuing the Exchange Fund Account's gold holdings at the former official price of 35 Special Drawing Rights, about $36 U. S. per ounce, rather than at market value, is not in strict conformity with the act. The Auditor General has also queried the legal basis for the existing accounting practice of paying the excess of receipts over book value on Exchange Fund Account sales of gold to the Consolidated Revenue Fund over a three-year period.

It is generally recognized that valuing the Exchange Fund Account's gold at market price has important shortcomings. Gold prices have been subject to large fluctuations in recent years; using market prices to value our gold reserves would have resulted in large changes in the reported level of our reserves, even in the absence of transactions. It is also unlikely that the current market price would provide a reliable guide to the eventual selling price if large sales were contemplated. It may be remarked that no major industrial country reports its gold reserves at the current market value. The amendments allow for a continuation of present valuation procedures, while providing the flexibility for writing up the book value of Canada's gold reserves, with the proviso that the book value not exceed the market price, should this become appropriate.

Turning to the practice of recording gains on the sale of gold as valuation gains and transferring them to the Consolidated Revenue Fund over a three-year period, the amendment would explicitly provide for this, which corresponds to the treatment of valuation of gains resulting from exchange rate changes. This procedure has the effect of evening out year-to-year transfers to the Consolidated Revenue Fund due to abnormal or irregular movements and is consistent with the amendments to the Currency and Exchange Act of 1977, which made a distinction between net investment income and valuation gains or losses and provided for transfers to the Consolidated Revenue Fund based on their different characters. The Auditor General has indicated that these amendments would overcome the reservations that he expressed in recent audits of the Exchange Fund Account.

In passing, I would like to note that the payment of income by the Exchange Fund Account to the Consolidated Revenue Fund is essentially a bookkeeping entry only—there is no cash transfer. The Exchange Fund Account retains the income from foreign currency assets, and the Canadian dollar equivalent which is paid to the Consolidated Revenue Fund is offset by an increase in Canadian dollar advances to the Exchange Fund Account by the Consolidated Revenue Fund, so that cash holdings remain unchanged.

It is also proposed to widen the provisions under which the minister may engage in gold transactions in order to enhance the ability of the Exchange Fund Account to earn additional revenues on its assets. Finally, it is proposed to shorten the title of the act to the Currency Act—the additional wording serves no purpose—and to make some minor changes to the wording of the act designed to clarify and modernize it.

Honourable senators, that is the presentation of the explanation of Bill C-11. If there are any questions, I will try to answer them.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Charbonneau, debate adjourned.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator

Lapointe, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-12, intituled: "An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977".—(Honourable Senator Tremblay).

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I welcomed the suggestion by the Acting Leader of the Government to have the agenda modified so that Senator Stanbury could introduce the bill he is sponsoring before I started my speech. I agreed, but not because, as Senator Frith seemed to imply, my speech would be more substantial than the honourable senator's. In fact, although Senator Stanbury's comments were more succinct than I intend to be in my speech, there was real substance in what the senator said. As for the substance of my own speech, I will let you be the judge.

My contribution to the debate on second reading of Bill C-12 will concern four points. I think we could see these points as basic to the philosophy of this legislation. The first point will be the abandoning of the block grant approach for health and post-secondary education as the format for federal financing in these areas of provincial jurisdiction. The second point will be the proposed formula for indexing, as it were, the increases in federal contributions for health and post-secondary education. In my third point I will analyze the allocation by the provinces of federal subsidies for health and post-secondary education. Finally, in my fourth and last point, I shall expand on the concept of federal involvement in defining national objectives for post-secondary education.

As far as the first point is concerned, namely, abandoning the block grant and going back to what I would call sectoral transfer payments, in 1977, after lengthy negotiations with the provinces on fiscal arrangements for the period from 1977 to 1982, the federal Government finally agreed to consolidate transfer payments for health and post-secondary education in a single block grant. These contributions had until that time been made as separate transfers, either in the form of tax points subject to equalization or in the form of cash payments.

This development was particularly significant for the provinces, because with the block grant formula they were given far greater latitude in allocating the funds received according to their own priorities.

To fully grasp the significance of this decision, we would have to work our way back through every 5-year period to the 1950s. At that time, the federal Government became involved in these areas of provincial jurisdiction when it provided the provinces with funds for the purpose of financing these sectors.

During the debate on Bill C-3, which has now become law, we already had occasion to give an historical overview with respect to health programs.

I shall therefore do the same, but only with respect to post-secondary education. I would refer honourable senators to a speech by Senator Hicks on the subject on February 18, 1982, a remarkable piece of work in many respects. However, I noticed some details were omitted on a point that deserves to be recalled in the present circumstances. I did not find it in Hansard of February 18, 1982. I am referring to the arrangements concluded in 1959 and 1960 by the federal Government and Quebec, to get out of the impasse that had existed since 1952 or 1953—I do not remember the exact date. Honourable senators will recall that for the first year, the subsidies for universities, introduced by the federal Government following recommendations made in the report of the Massey-Lévesque Commission, were initially accepted by the Government of Quebec, I think it was for 1951-52. Subsequently, the Quebec Government refused to let federal subsidies be paid to Quebec universities. An impasse was thus reached, and I will not go into the details of the situation.

In 1959-60, an arrangement was concluded, the so-called Fleming-Sauvé formula. The arrangement provided—and this was a first—for transfer of tax points in lieu of direct subsidies to the universities. As to the principle, that formula remains unchanged. The federal contribution to post-secondary education financing is still made up of a tax transfer and a cash payment. Needless to say, however, the amounts involved are not the same. They are much larger now than they were in 1960.

I think it is important to remember that that is the starting point. Without any reference to what eventually became known as opting out, it was at that time that we first heard about the principle which later on led to the opting out formula. It was written into that provision of the Fleming-Sauvé formula.

In any case, if my reading of the bill is correct, it does not change anything in the basic situation created by the Fleming-Sauvé formula. To be quite sure, however, since it has been pointed out on numerous occasions that the wording of this bill is sometimes unclear and hard to understand, to be quite sure, as I said, that my reading of the bill is correct, I intend to ask some questions on that subject when the committee gets around to the consideration of the bill. For the time being, let us assume that my reading of the bill is correct and that indeed, with respect to the principle, we are still operating under the Fleming-Sauvé formula. From the point of view of the provinces, however, the return to a sectoral approach is definitely a backward step as compared with the situation created in 1977, all the more so since that backward step comes with an obviously discriminatory treatment as far as the health sector and post-secondary education are concerned.

● (1450)

And now my second point: with respect to post-secondary education, Bill C-12 sets on the growth of federal financing a ceiling of 6 and 5 per cent respectively for the years 1983-84 and 1984-85. It does not do the same thing in the health sector which will thus benefit from more generous federal financing. As Miss Bégin stated before the committee, the growth of federal health grants in those two years will be about 11 per cent, possibly more.

Why such discrimination? That has yet to be explained to us. Would it be that, from the standpoint of the federal government, health programs have priority over post-secondary education programs? Do health programs fall into realms of more obvious collective sensitivity—to put it euphemistical-ly—since both sectors are given a different treatment under Bill C-12? I expect that a government spokesman will explain the difference to us.

[Senator Tremblay.]

I think that post-secondary education ought to be put on the same footing as the health sector.

Otherwise, it seems to me there is a contradiction in the government position. First, they insist that we must invest in post-secondary education if we are to come to grips with technological change and the new challenges which Canadians must face, therefore more investment is needed in post-secondary education. And yet, they reduce the growth of federal contributions in that field. Senator Kelly made a thorough analysis of that aspect of the question, so I will say no more except point out briefly the dilemmas which the provinces will face, particularly Quebec.

The effects of this ceiling on federal financing for post-secondary education are easy to imagine from a provincial viewpoint. The provinces will either have to raise admission costs to make up the difference or to reduce services. I have in mind especially the teaching services where the result would be an increase in the student-to-teacher ratio, for instance.

The provinces will inevitably have to increase either their taxes or their deficit. They will then be faced with the paradox that, to reduce their deficit, the federal government will have to transfer funds to them. What will this new type of deficit transfer from one level of government to another mean for the Canadian economy as a whole?

I now come to my third point, which concerns the way in which the provinces use the funds provided by the federal government for post-secondary education. The problem has already been discussed with respect to health services. I must say that I found it particularly interesting to analyze the tables which Senator Hicks submitted in 1982, as he reminded us in his speech last May 9.

In general, we note that, from 1974-75 to 1981-82—more recent figures might be available, but I am not in a position to obtain them—during this period, for the established minority language and second language programs, for which the table included the secondary level, the federal participation did increase. It went up from 48 per cent to 57 per cent. Beginning with the situation in 1967, following an agreement with the provinces, the federal government would no longer help finance professional teaching at the secondary level; it had done so for many years, but from then on, it would concentrate on the post-secondary level. I remember quite well that everyone agreed at the conference held in the fall of 1966 that this was a priority and that the federal government should focus on post-secondary education.

At that time, the formula for determining the federal share was that the government would pay 50 per cent of operational costs. It is on this basis that in 1967-68 and the years that followed, the federal government contributed about 50 per cent. However, in 1974-75, the federal share went down to 48 per cent for all the provinces. It then went back up to 57 per cent.

• (1500)

However, these general figures conceal variations between provinces. It was pointed out by Senator Hicks that, in some provinces, we have the paradox of the federal share representing over 100 per cent of total expenses. I do not intend to deal with the other provinces; I imagine that the senators from those regions will be able to analyze the phenomenon more in depth.

I shall simply say that Quebec, for once, or rather once again, as it is an exceptional province, stands out, but this time in an exemplary fashion. It is the only province that has respected throughout the years the agreement or system implemented in 1967-68 under which the federal share was to be kept at 50 per cent. Indeed, for that period alone, in 1974-75, it remained at 50 per cent; in 1975-76, it was 46 per cent and even dropped down to 46 per cent before finally climbing back to 49 per cent in 1981-82.

I do not pass judgement on the way the other provinces have allocated the federal funds they received for post-secondary education, but I wish to emphasize the fact that Quebec cannot be accused of delinquency, to the extent that the use for purposes other than post-secondary education may be considered as some form of delinquency. Since reference was made to delinquency, and Senator Hicks emphasized he would not go as far as saying this was done illegally, I must state there is no formal delinquency because, in effect, the system has so far been respectful of provincial autonomy in the use of funds provided by the Canadian Government, in that matter of clear and exclusive provincial responsibility.

On that subject, I must submit that in spite of what was said during the debate on the bill in the other place, Bill C-12 does not go abusively far. Indeed, Clause 9, under which a new section to the Fiscal Arrangements Act is introduced, provides:

The Secretary of State shall cause to be laid before each House of Parliament, not later than the fifth sitting day of that House after the 31st day of January next following the end of each fiscal year that begins after March 31, 1984, a report for that fiscal year on

- (a) cash contributions and total equalized tax transfers in respect of the post-secondary education financing program applicable to each province;
- (b) expenditures by each province on post-secondary education;
- (c) any other federal programs of support to or involvement in post-secondary education;

Up to that point, Bill C-12, in my view, creates no problem. At least, I see no problem in collecting data which will clearly show the contribution of other sources of funding for post-secondary education within the provinces, tuition fees, for instance, and federal contributions, and the extent to which they all share in the financing of post-secondary education.

However, it is quite a different story with the remainder of the clause. The following paragraphs of that clause raise the whole question of the federal role in identifying national goals for post-secondary education, which brings me to my fourth and final point.

Reference to that role appears in Clause 9(d), which specifies one of the matters on which the Minister is to report, namely:

- (d) the relationship between such federal contributions, transfers and programs and Canada's educational and economic goals; and and another in Clause 9(e):

- (e) the results of any consultations by or on behalf of the Secretary of State with the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada relating to the definition of national purposes to be served by post-secondary education and the means by which the governments of Canada and the provinces will achieve those purposes.

Whether such reports are later referred to a Committee of the House of Commons or of the Senate, or to a Joint Committee, is no problem in my view. But, when Senator Hicks spoke on second reading of the bill, I asked him specifically what was hidden behind those apparently innocuous paragraphs that provided only for a report, but what exactly was the hidden intention.

I appreciate Senator Hicks could not answer at that point, but this morning, Le Devoir published the clear-cut and emphatic answer from the Secretary of State. Here is the most significant parts of that report from the Canadian Press:

The current agreements on education will come to an end in March 1985. If, in the meantime, Ottawa and the provinces cannot agree, the Canadian Government will proceed with a bill allowing them to shut down the dollar valve "under certain conditions", as Mr. Joyal stated yesterday.

"We will try to negotiate, but if we cannot agree, we will have to legislate", emphasized Mr. Joyal. He went on to say that Ottawa must "have a presence" in that area, and "monitor the use of its funds".

Another quote, two paragraphs further:

For years, the federal Government has been demanding that post-secondary education in this country, which is clearly a provincial responsibility, meet four goals: absolute mobility of students across the provinces; freedom of education in their own language for students of linguistic minorities; but above all, Ottawa wants the provinces to restrict the use of those grants to education, and intends to enhance the federal visibility in post-secondary education.

So this Government, if it is still in power in 1985, will legislate to impose upon provinces certain goals it deems essential, even though provinces would not agree, since negotiations would have broken down. In that light, we have to stress the most debatable, not to say unconstitutional, nature of such federal legislation so clearly envisaged by the Secretary of State.

It is because of its spending power that the federal government may pay subsidies to the provinces for post-secondary education, an area which, need I remind honourable senators, comes clearly under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

Under which conditions can the federal government exercise its spending power while respecting the Canadian Constitution?

Senator Roblin listed them when the Senate had to deal with Bill C-3, namely the Canada Health Act. It might be useful to repeat them. Around 1936, the Privy Council itself ruled unequivocally on this in connection with the Employment and Social Insurance Act. Here is the relevant excerpt which appeared in the Lamontagne Report. On appeal, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council stated the general principle in this way:

That the Dominion may impose taxation for the purpose of creating a fund for special purposes and may apply that fund for making contributions in the public interest to individuals, corporations or public authorities could not as a general proposition be denied... But assuming that the Dominion has collected by means of taxation a fund, it by no means follows that any legislation which disposes of it is necessarily within Dominion competence.

It may still be legislation affecting classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92, and, if so, would be ultra vires. In other words, Dominion legislation, even though it deals with Dominion property, may yet be so framed as to invade civil rights within the provinces, or encroach upon the classes of subjects which are reserved to provincial competence... If on the true view of the legislation it is found that in reality in pith and substance the legislation invades civil rights within the Province or in respect of other classes of subjects otherwise encroaches upon the provincial field, the legislation will be invalid.

Until now, as far as I know, there has been no clarification or legislation disclaiming this ruling by the Privy Council. For all practical purposes, this ruling reflects the current Constitutional situation. Surely, legislation such as that which the Secretary of State indicated would impose on the provinces so-called national objectives in the area of post-secondary education would be, in my opinion, completely ultra vires. Fortunately, we have not reached that point yet. They are satisfied with raising the possibility of negotiations, of carrying out studies on a possible relationship between federal payments and Canada's objectives in the area of economy, education, etc.

We are faced with the prospect of a government appointed official, which justifies all our fears. That is why that part of Clause 9 is extremely questionable.

These are, in short, the four points I wanted to make. In my view, from whatever angle it is considered, whether it is from the point of view of the 6 and 5 per cent freeze, or the increase in federal grants for post-secondary education, with the whole range of fairly dramatic constraints and dilemmas it will create for the provinces, or the national goals that the Secretary of State has so clearly stated and which are likely to give rise to particular pieces of legislation. Bill C-12 does not solve, to say the least, the problems which it may be purporting to solve. It raises more new problems than it solves, if by any chance it solves any. Therefore, this bill is so contentious and indeed unacceptable that, as far as I am concerned, when second reading debate is over, I will flatly oppose its passage.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in moving adjournment of the debate, I want to remind you, as I already pointed out yesterday, that Senator Hicks will be absent next week. We have decided or, if you prefer, it was agreed to put the question probably next Tuesday evening. I will then voice some ideas and give some answers on behalf of Senator Hicks.

In moving adjournment, I would like to stress that I will of course be prepared Tuesday evening to give the floor to other honourable senators who would like to speak before I close the debate. If I were to speak today on behalf of Senator Hicks, that would have the effect of closing the debate. I do not wish to do so. I want to stress this fact so that other senators who would like to speak can prepare their speech for Tuesday evening. After that, I intend to close the debate on behalf of Senator Hicks, and then the question will be put.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES OF CANADA

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Aboriginal Peoples of Canada;

That the Committee be composed of eight Senators;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I spoke to Senator Watt about the need to have members willing to serve on this committee before we can go any further with it. I believe he has the undertakings of some persons on this side to serve and he is discussing the matter with members on the other side. We had some idea that we might be able to proceed with the matter today but since Senator Flynn and Senator Roblin are absent and because of the short notice I gave to Senator Macdonald, I suggest that we deal with the motion next week.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

NOTICE OF INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On the Inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C.:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the important changes being proposed to the Western Grain Stabilization Act so as to make the said Act more responsive to producers' needs.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, since the other place is proceeding with the legislation on this matter and since there is some question as to whether it is in order to call attention to legislation in an inquiry as distinct from having an order for a pre-study, I think it is best that we withdraw this inquiry. Senator Argue has asked me to ask the leave of the Senate to withdraw the inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

CANADIAN VETERANS

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

On the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues still facing Canadian veterans;

That the Committee be composed of 5 Senators to be designated at a later date;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than November 1, 1984.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Since Senator Marshall's new motion deals with the same subject matter as this one, with the exception that the new one involves a reference to a standing committee, I am wondering whether he wishes leave to withdraw this motion.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I would like to wait until Tuesday.

Senator Frith: Fine. That is a safe play.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 29, 1984 at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 29, 1984

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

POVERTY IN CANADA

PRINTING OF SIXTH EDITION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, today you found in your office the 1984 edition of the Report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada. It had just come off the press and it is in both official languages. The report was first printed in 1971 and reprinted in 1972, 1974, 1976, 1980 and 1984 in both official languages, for a total of 28,500 copies. It is indeed a landmark report. It did not solve the problem of poverty, but it has made thousands of people in Canada, who were not poverty stricken, aware of the problem and it has been an inspiration to many. This year's reprint was for 1,000 copies, bringing the total, as I said, to 28,500 copies printed. A thousand copies of the report were given away to government ministries across the country, government departments, libraries, universities and provincial departments that requested copies. Over the years, the report has sold at prices beginning in 1971 at $2, increasing to $3, $5 and $7. The present price is $7.95 and outside this country it costs $9.95. It is the single most popular parliamentary report printed since 1867.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Croll: More copies of this report have been printed and sold than any other single report in the history of this country. It has made a vital contribution over the years to the relief of poverty, a contribution which has been considerable and noteworthy. It is used as a text book and research document in every university in Canada and has made a great impression on the Canadian people.

The report is the exclusive product of this chamber. It is a combined effort and stands to the credit of the totality of this place and indicates the type of work we can do in a proper environment. Particular thanks are due to the late Senator John Connolly, and Senator Perrault and Senator Flynn who encouraged and supported the study. The original number of members on the committee was 20. Eight members are in this house at the present time, four are retired and eight have passed on. It is appropriate that I inscribe the names of the committee members still in this chamber. They are: Senators Rhéal Bélisle, Eric Cook, Douglas D. Everett, Earl A. Hastings, Elsie Inman, Fred A. McGrand, Herbert O. Sparrow and myself.

This report has stood the test of time by describing as the poverty line an amount that is approximately 50 per cent of the average Canadian family income, adjusted to family size and making provision for inflation and gross national product. It has been widely approved and copied. Moreover, a Member of Parliament, who is a candidate for the Liberal leadership, the Honourable Donald Johnston, has made it part of his interesting platform to combine social assistance programs into one guaranteed income plan. We did not invent the guaranteed income in our report, but 15 years ago we got it off the ground as a social and political movement. We made the idea of it respected, practical and acceptable.

I should point out that in addition to the reports, we have printed more than 10,000 booklets highlighting the major parts of the various reports to send to people who could not afford the expense of the full reports. We ran out of those very quickly.

All in all, honourable senators, it was a good day's work for the Senate. The report which honourable senators have is worthy of placement in home libraries.

After 15 years, one wonders whether the time has come for the updating of the report through new eyes.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

PACIFIC FISHING FLEET—BUY-BACK PROGRAM

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Social Development. My question has to do with his attendance at a meeting late in April on the west coast where he indicated that the government was interested in introducing legislation having to do with the buy-back program of the Pacific fishing fleet. The minister in the other place confirmed that there would be legislation forthcoming, but he did not indicate how soon. Since Senator Austin is involved, can he indicate to this chamber whether we will see this legislation before the end of the session?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I made a statement on behalf of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and myself on the Pacific coast salmon industry in which I outlined the new policy approaches which we would be taking. In outlining those approaches, I said that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans would introduce a bill in the other place in this session. That bill is being readied; I hope and expect it will be introduced within two weeks' time. I also hope that its treatment will be similar to that afforded by the other place and the Senate to the legislation on the Atlantic fisheries reorganization.

I believe that the Pacific coast salmon industry bill will not be controversial in a partisan way and that members of all parties will want to see it enacted quickly so as to alleviate the very serious financial conditions of fishermen on the Pacific coast.

Senator Marshall: Will the minister indicate if the legislation will be similar to that introduced on behalf of the east coast fishery with regard to restructuring of that fishery? Will it be done on the same basis, and will it involve the CDIC?

Senator Austin: I will be happy to send the honourable senator a copy of my address to the Fisheries Council of Canada at its annual meeting held in Vancouver in April. In brief, the bill will be quite different in the reorganization of the Pacific coast fishing industry. It will not involve CDIC or any other crown corporation, save and except in one particular detail which does not concern itself with the operation of the ongoing fishing industry.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. There was an announcement in the press that the Honourable Francis Fox, Minister of Communications, would today unveil the new policy with regard to the National Film Board. I am wondering if that was the document tabled by the Leader of the Government, or whether it has yet come to hand. Would the Leader of the Government make us privy to whatever this policy has been declared to be, because a number of honourable senators are interested in the performance of the National Film Board, particularly as some of us decry the use of public money in producing a film that we consider not particularly elevating, or helpful in presenting Canada to other nations.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not believe that the report that I tabled early this evening is exactly what Senator Molson is asking for, although it is related since it had to do with films and video policy. I believe the honourable senator is correct that there was an announcement that the policy of the National Film Board would be made known today or at least very soon. I will try to obtain a copy for the honourable senator.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

STUDIES RE PHASING-OUT OF DEPARTMENT

Question No. 6 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

Has the Government of Canada carried out any studies having to do with phasing out the Department of Veterans Affairs and, if so, what are the details?

Reply by the Minister of Veterans Affairs:

No, the Government of Canada has not carried out any studies having to do with phasing out the Department of Veterans Affairs.

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lapointe, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-12, intituled: "An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I mentioned last week, Senator Hicks, who is the sponsor of the bill, is unable to be here this week. He has left me some notes. I will speak on his behalf to close the debate on second reading, but, as I said, I am quite ready to yield the floor to anyone who wishes to speak before I do so.

● (2010)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about this interesting bill and make a contribution to what has been, up to now, a curious debate; curious because there seems to have been careful reticence on the part of some who are recommending it to us to acknowledge its main purpose. To be clear, it seems to me its main purpose is to save money.

During the course of this debate we have heard a good deal about other aspects of this bill. There has been a lot of talk about the shortcomings of some of the nefarious provinces and the way they handle the educational grants they receive from the Government of Canada. There has also been some concern about improving the visibility of the federal contribution in this particular field. Of course, the bill does contain a measure to split the various federal grants.

It seems to me the main thrust is clear: It is to save money. It is to introduce the six-and-five régime to the schedule of federal grants to the provinces for the purposes of post-secondary education.

I do not know, but I think that if there had been a little candour in discussing the financial problems of the federal government in relationship to this bill, some sympathy might have been stimulated in the hearts of some of us who are trying to persuade the government to have a sensible policy for reducing their expenses and the deficit. We might even have approved the ends although we might reprobate the means of achieving an economy in reduced levels of federal expenditures at this particular phase in the life of our country by squeezing the federal grants to post-secondary education. Because that is what this bill does—it squeezes the federal grants to post-secondary education.

This particular trend is not exactly new because, over the past few years, we have seen a move, a quiet, unobtrusive but gradual move toward putting the squeeze on federal grants to post-secondary education. A little while ago, I think it was in 1982, we had the budget of the day which abolished, in a unilateral way, what was called the Revenue Guarantee Formula. If you ask what the Revenue Guarantee Formula had to do with post-secondary education, I would remind the chamber that it was one of the conditions of the formula by which the Established Programs Financing Act operated. The Established Programs Financing Act was one which regulated the transfer of funds from the federal government to the provinces for the established programs in the fields of health, hospitals, medicare and post-secondary education.

We had a rather good committee of the House of Commons which examined the question of these established programs financing arrangements. It went to some lengths to hear representations from a number of people and to analyze the various formulae that were applied to this distribution of federal funds. It made a report to the House of Commons and to the government of the day. Its report included an examination of the Revenue Guarantee Formula and concluded that it was something that ought to be retained because it represented a safety net, and it represented a protection to the provinces in the event of certain things happening with respect to the public finances of the country, which would enable them to approach their task of handling the established programs financing arrangements with some confidence. It was placed in the formula, in the first place, as a result of careful consideration—indeed, as a bargain—between the federal and provincial sides in the argument. Yet we find that this Revenue Guarantee Formula was eliminated unilaterally in the budget of 1982, in spite of the fact that previously a special committee of the House of Commons—a task force—had made it clear that this should not be done, that the revenue guarantee was an essential part of the formula and should be retained.

It had the financial effect of reducing the amount of the transfers by approximately a billion dollars in the first year. Of course, because it was omitted from then on, it had a multiplier effect in the years that followed. Part of that billion dollars, certainly, was at the expense of the post-secondary education financing systems that were in force to support that important aspect of public policy.

Incidentally, I should say—and I regret that Senator Hicks is not here to listen to this since he might have wished to comment upon it—this task force of the House of Commons had something to say today about whether or not the provinces were cheating on these grants. If I can find my place in this parcel of papers I have in front of me, I will share this opinion with the chamber. The members of the task force made it quite clear that they did not think the provinces—in particular, the maritime provinces, to which allusion has been made—had misappropriated or, if that is too strong a word, had been “fudging” the application of the funds that they received from the federal government for health and for secondary education. I will read this little extract because it is apropos to the question. I quote as follows:

The apparent increase in the federal share of post-secondary education costs was particularly exaggerated for the Atlantic provinces that had earlier selected the $15 per capita option, because an excessive share of the federal transfer was attributed to education by the federal government's use of the 32.1 per cent ratio.

I will come back to the ratio later on. I continue the quotation:

The Task Force is concerned that this background be understood, and that provincial governments not be unfairly criticized for not doing what clearly would have been irresponsible and irrelevant to attempt: namely to establish in each province targets of 50-50 matching that had earlier prevailed only for national totals, if at all.

I think it is important to point this out, because if I were a provincial politician I might be a bit upset at the suggestion that I had not been playing ball, or, at any rate, had been playing unfair ball with the Government of Canada in the application of these educational funds. I therefore leave that comment with the house because, particularly in view of what I am going to say before I have finished my remarks tonight, I believe that the relationship between the federal government and the provinces in this matter is of some importance.

Regardless of all of that, however, what happened was that the federal government repudiated the revenue guarantee with a consequent effect on educational financing. Now, in Bill C-12, they are adding to the situation. They are compounding the issue. They are proposing that the six-and-five formula be applied to these grants in a retroactive way. This means that, in the first year when the 6 per cent applies, the retroactive factor reduces what would otherwise be paid to the provinces by $118 million, and, in the second year, by $260 million, which gives a total reduction of $378 million.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): The bill limits it to two years.

Senator Roblin: Yes, but as my honourable friend understands only too well, it not only limits it for two years but it establishes a lower foundation, a lower threshold, a lower formula from now to infinity insofar as these grants are concerned. It has that particular effect, which should be noted by this chamber. It is not just the effect of years one and two; it is the continuing effect because the threshold has been lowered for all future calculations of this sum.

Each province is affected quite differently, but in my own province—and I am naturally concerned about that—in the first year it is going to cost about $5 million, while in the second year it will cost about $11 million. In terms of the amounts of money we are accustomed to talking about in this place, that does not sound like very much. Let me tell honourable senators, however, that it is important to the three universities of Manitoba and the technical institutes of that province, which also come under the description of post-secondary education. I am, therefore, in a position to say that the effects of this provision will be very real.

• (2020)

Now that we are talking about the six-and-five principle, I made an interesting calculation the other day which perhaps may have some bearing on this argument. I examined the effect, according to the figures released by the government, of the six-and-five on the salaries paid to public servants of the federal government in this country for the first year of the six-and-five policy. During that first year, for reasons which are obvious when you look at them and which need not be detailed here, instead of a ceiling of 6 per cent, the ceiling actually was 9.5 per cent. In fact, the total remuneration for people in this category went up by $700 million and roughly for the same number of civil servants. So the 9.5 per cent increase cost $700 million. If the 6 per cent ceiling had been maintained or could have been maintained, the cost would have been an extra $440 million only, so there is an overage in year one over the 6 per cent formula with respect to the public civil service of the federal government of $260 million. That is more than double the savings the government is going to make by slicing the educational grants for post-secondary education in year one under this bill. If we had been able to hold the line at 6 per cent in respect of the public service wages in this country, there would be no need for this bill. As a matter of fact, we could have increased the grants by giving them the difference, if you want to look at it that way.

I must confess that it is a curious standard of judgment where we find that today it is sound government policy to reduce the grants to post-secondary education. Everywhere we hear the cry that we have a shortage of trained people. Some even go so far as to say that the shortage of trained people in this era of high technology is the greatest threat there is to the Canadian economy. Certainly, there is something to be said for that point of view. Brain power is our greatest natural resource and to an extent it is a neglected natural resource. We know that with respect to our young people between the ages of 15 and 24, the youth generation as you might say, the rate of employment is 18.5 per cent. There are 540,000 young Canadians, about half the people unemployed, who are in the category who might possibly be considered to be the beneficiaries of the post-secondary education system that we have, and might be considered as the people who would be primarily affected by any change we made that would reduce our support to that important public function. The need to train some of our unemployed in this period of high unemployment is well known. We hear the government proclaiming its concern for these jobless young people and, yet, it is slicing some $360 million over two years over what otherwise would be made available for post-secondary education.

Hon. Martial Asselin: We will have a new government of youth.

Senator Roblin: There may be a new government—you can't tell.

It is a curious "hit" list that the government has developed here. The provinces with the highest student population, namely, the maritimes, are on the "hit" list. There is a general rising enrolment in the post-secondary educational system of our country. There has been for some time, but it is still ongoing and all students are on this "hit" list. The students who have trouble finding the wherewithal for their education are certainly on this "hit" list because they would all be paying higher fees and, yet, in this situation we find the federal government backing off to the extent of $360 million over two years in its support. I do not think that that represents a sense of priority that appeals. It does not seem to represent a careful consideration of benefit costs. One is sympathetic with the idea of reducing government expenses, but when there is no serious deficit reducing plan around, and we see these expenses going up or, at least, these deficits being maintained with little reduction over the forecasting future that the government has adopted, it certainly does not seem to me that this hit-and-miss shot at the post-secondary education system is a good idea.

I think it perverse; I think it ill-considered; I think it ought to be changed; I think it ought to be abandoned.

Honourable senators, we are going to have to vote on second reading of this bill later this evening. I suppose that it will pass, but perhaps I am being too pessimistic and ought to hold the view that some honourable senators might be prepared to offer a different judgment from that which government supporters are liable to give this evening. If the bill receives second reading this evening, I understand that there will be a motion to refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I think I have a better suggestion than that; I suggest that it be referred to the Special Senate Committee on Youth, of which the Honourable Senator Hébert is chairman. He recommended the establishment of that committee with such eloquence and conviction that he secured the support of the government when he first suggested it. This bill is right up his alley, because if anyone is affected by this bill it is the young people of this country. I wonder if the government would consider whether this bill should be referred to that committee. As a matter of fact, I rather suspected that in view of Senator Hébert's interest in the subject he might have taken the opportunity to recommend that his committee on youth was best qualified by its mandate to investigate the subject of this bill. I think his committee would be well suited to consider the wider implications of this measure on the youth of this country.

I do not know whether that suggestion will appeal to all honourable senators, but I offer it in my usual constructive way and hope that if Senator Hébert has an opportunity to consider the matter he might support the suggestion I have made.

As Senator Kelly and Senator Tremblay have already stated, this bill involves unilateral action and affects every provincial budget, every provincial secondary education institution, whether it be a university or a technical college. If they come under the rubric of post-secondary education, they are going to feel the effects of this bill.

We know that there is also another matter at issue between the federal government and the provinces dealing with the statistics on which post-secondary education financing is calculated. The question of what share of the Established Program Financing grants go to education in each province is one that is far from being agreed upon. The federal government has one set of figures based on one way of looking at the subject and the provinces have another. I predict that that will cause some considerable difficulty in the months ahead.

There is a good case for suggesting that the report of the provincial ministers of finance issued in April of last year dealing with this subject, among other things, be something that could well be taken into consideration. But there has been a new development—and this brings me to the end of my contribution to this debate—in this whole problem. It now appears that there is a trend emerging, at least in the minds of some of the leading figures of the current administration, that this whole matter of federal contribution to post-secondary education is something that has to be re-examined. There has been a definite suggestion, not only by those campaigning in the current Liberal leadership race but by others who are not involved in it, that the federal government has to look at what happens to its money when it is paid to the provinces in respect of post-secondary education.

Forget about the fact that this is within the provincial constitutional realm; forget about the fact that we brought in the block grant system in order to make sure we did not trespass on the constitutional rights of the provinces, but consider the fact that, arising from this measure we have a distinct new development, a new trend, a new line of thought emerging in respect of leaders of the federal administration.

The first hint of this came when Mr. John Evans, a Liberal member of Parliament, offered the suggestion last February that:

Legislation similar to the proposed Canada Health Act, which would impose financial penalties on provinces for allowing health-care user fees, may be necessary to stop provinces from diverting federal funds provided for post-secondary education to other priorities.

● (2030)

That was a very quiet and muted opening gun. It now appears to be a new way of looking at federal responsibilities for education on the part of the federal government.

[Senator Roblin.]

In the last few days we have had the Honourable John Roberts telling us that a centralized authority at the federal level is needed to co-ordinate post-secondary education. That covers a lot of ground and seems to be a most direct challenge to the constitutional division of powers of this country and seems to be an obvious indication that this federal administration is giving some thought to using the federal fiscal power to impose its view of policy in the field of education on the provinces of this nation. Donald Johnston feels it is high time that disparities in education across the country were addressed. John Munro is calling for minimal standards. Eugene Whelan claims that the provinces have failed miserably in the field of education. You see, the stage is being set for some kind of new initiative on the part of the federal government in this whole matter. John Turner, who, I have to admit, is not a member of Parliament and may never be, but the odds are that he will be—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Who are his supporters?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friends will applaud a lot more if he becomes the leader of their party and the man who will be responsible for enunciating their policies because he has made statements about imposing federal priorities on education.

This bill is raising in my mind, perhaps in the minds of others and certainly in the mind of Mr. Claude Ryan, whose concern in education is well known, that the government is laying the ground work for some new initiative in this whole field which will bring the power of the federal purse to bear on the provincial realm of policy making in the field of education. Mr. Ryan expressed it very well when he said:

[Translation]

One thing to be avoided is that transfer payments become, in the hands of the central authority, instruments of pressure against or control over the provinces.

[English]

Certainly, the cat is out of the bag in the Province of Quebec insofar as this matter is concerned. I think it is something of which we in this chamber would do well to take note, interested as we are in the Constitution, conscious as we are of our responsibility to consider regional interests, conscious as we are of the fact that education is within the provincial area of jurisdiction and conscious as I think we should be that changes are in the wind. It seems to me that if there was ever a reason for delaying the consideration of this measure and if there was ever any responsibility on the part of the members of this house to take the provinces into account in dealing with matters of this kind, that case is one that can be described as Bill C-12. It is for these reasons that I am going to move a six-month hoist. I believe that we require an opportunity to see that these new developments are ventilated in a proper way and to ensure that the provinces have an opportunity to carefully examine this constitutional initiative, as I fear it may prove to be, before it receives too much momentum or gets out of the starting gate too fast. Therefore, I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-12, intituled: "An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977", be not now read the second time but that it be read the second time this day six months' hence."

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Go ahead, Steuart, get up. If you have something to say, say it, instead of shaking your head.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this motion in amendment?

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wish to speak to the amendment, unless some members of the government wish to.

Senator Asselin: Who else wants to speak?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): One at a time.

Senator Flynn: They are the silent partners.

Senator Murray: I would like to take up where the Deputy Leader of the Opposition left off. I shall not cover the ground that he covered so well or the ground covered by Senator Tremblay, Senator Kelly and Senator Hicks, who introduced the bill.

The purpose of my intervention is to place on record some information about established programs financing that I believe needs to be there in order to place some of Senator Hicks' statements in a more balanced perspective. In particular, I refer to Senator Hicks' statements concerning the respective contributions of the federal government and provincial governments to post-secondary education. When Senator Hicks opened this debate on May 9 he referred to a speech that he made in this chamber on February 18, 1982. He made the assertion in 1982 and again when he opened this debate that some of the provinces at least had been riding the coattails of the federal government and had not been providing a fair and adequate measure of support to post-secondary education over the past 10 or 15 years. I suppose that "fair and adequate" are in the mind of the beholder or recipient or, indeed, the donor. In any case, I am not going to quarrel on the basis of such a qualitative description of what has been given by the federal or provincial governments to the support of post-secondary education.

But Senator Hicks said more than that on May 9 and, indeed, in his previous speech on February 9, 1982. He repeated the assertion that in particular three or four of the Atlantic provinces were not granting as much support to post-secondary education as they received from Ottawa. To understand Senator Hicks' argument you have to accept the federal government's assertion—which, until now, has been only an assertion but to which they are now trying to give some legislative legitimacy—that 67.9 per cent of established programs financing—that is, the block funding—is supposed to go to health and 32.1 per cent is supposed to go to post-secondary education.

But where did that allocation formula come from? Is it valid? Is it legitimate? Is it relevant? Honourable senators, that allocation formula is arbitrary. It is an arbitrary invention of the federal government. It was of dubious validity in 1977 when they brought it down and it is irrelevant today.

● (2040)

Prior to 1977 when the established programs financing was being negotiated with the provinces, the argument that the federal government advanced to the provinces in order to sell this concept was that block funding for health and post-secondary education would give the provinces increased flexibility in making their program decisions; that block funding would enable the provinces to practice restraint by applying the available funds as between post-secondary education and health and among the different programs in those fields, and that it would give them the flexibility to use the funds as they saw fit in those fields. The record is very clear on this point.

Mr. Trudeau enunciated in June 1976 at a federal-provincial conference of first ministers his five principles for continued federal participation in financing hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education. His first principle was that the federal government should continue to pay a substantial share of program costs. The second principle, and I invite the attention of honourable senators in particular to this principle, was that federal payments should be calculated independently of provincial program expenditures. Third, there should be greater equality in per capita terms among the provinces with regard to the amount of federal funds they receive under the programs. Fourth, the arrangements for these major programs should be placed on a more permanent footing. Well, in retrospect, tell that to the people who are trying to run the hospital and medicare programs in the provinces, or, indeed, the post-secondary institutions in the provinces. Some permanence! Some footing! Every time a problem arises the federal government tries to cut back, as it announced it would do in Mr. MacEachen's 1981 budget, and as it is doing now by applying the six-and-five formula to post-secondary education. The fifth principle was that there should be provision for continuing federal participation with the provinces in the consideration and development of policies of national significance in the fields of health and post-secondary education.

At the federal-provincial conference held on December 13, 1976, this is what Mr. Trudeau had to say, and I quote:

(The EPF proposal) also suits the current and future imperative, namely fiscal restraint, in that provinces will have a greater incentive to implement what are admittedly difficult measures designed to restrain spending in these fields to reasonable levels.

The next day Mr. Trudeau uttered a pithy and important statement at a press conference following the federal-provincial conference, which I think bears directly on the accusations being made against the provinces today. He said this:

Provinces will no longer have to spend a Provincial dollar to receive a Federal dollar.

The Honourable Marc Lalonde, who was the then Minister of National Health and Welfare, at the same conference of first ministers on December 13, 1976, said this:

Any savings that can be generated by reducing the services would not be shared by the Federal Government since our contribution under Established Programs would not be directly related to program costs.

I think the record is very clear as to the intention of the federal government and as to the understanding of the provincial governments when this block funding arrangement was negotiated between the two levels of government. It was not until after the EPF arrangement—the block funding deal, had been sold, negotiated and agreed to by the provinces as a package, with no distinction between health and post-secondary education, that Ottawa decided to split up the block funding arrangement. It was decided to chop it into several blocks, and send the medicare cheque and the hospital cheque out over the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and send the post-secondary education cheque out over the name of the Secretary of State. The provincial ministers of finance and the provincial treasurers were reviewing this history a year or so ago and had this to say:

—this action and the ratio used were of no consequence to the provinces. They remained unrestricted in their use of EPF funds and in setting their priorities for health care and higher education.

Honourable senators, I may say that this bill does not change that situation. As I have said, it gives some legislative legitimacy to this arbitrary allocation formula and some legislative legitimacy to the party line being taken by the federal government in the struggle for the minds and hearts of the Canadian voter. But the provinces will no more be bound by these allocations after this bill passes—if it passes—than they were before. Then why is it that the federal government purports to split the block funding into these separate components? The answer is that under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act there are certain program criteria, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare has the authority to withhold payments to provinces which fail to meet those criteria.

Thus, in 1977, after having made the package deal with the provinces, the federal government felt obliged to identify part of the block funding as being for hospital insurance and part for medicare in order that it would have some money to withhold. As my authority for that statement, I cite none other than the Deputy Prime Minister, the then Minister of Finance, the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen in his testimony to the House of Commons Task Force on Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements. I quote:

The authority for making payments under the Hospital Insurance and Medicare programs remains in the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act respectively. The original "program criteria" remain in force and the Minister of National Health and Welfare has retained authority to withhold payments from a province if the province's health insurance plan does not satisfy the federal conditions.

I underline the following sentence in Mr. MacEachen's statement for the benefit of honourable senators:

The basic reason for splitting cash payments among the "established" programs is to provide the Minister of Health and Welfare with an amount which may be withheld from a province.

Thus, honourable senators, it seems very clear on the basis of what Mr. MacEachen has said that the allocation formula—this 67.9 per cent that the federal government says is supposed to go to health and this 32.1 per cent that it says is supposed to go to post-secondary education—had very little to do with the respective needs, real or perceived, of health and post-secondary education then or now.

The allocation formula reflected the federal government's expenditures in those fields in the context of some previous formulae according to somewhat different criteria and on a nation-wide basis, not in any province in particular—not in any province at all, as a matter of fact.

The House of Commons task force made the point in what I think is a classic of understatement in its report of August 1981 when it said the following:

—interpretations differ as to whether the internal allocation adopted by the federal government (which arbitrarily assigns 32.1 per cent of the EPF transfer to post-secondary education and 67.9 per cent to health) can be taken as dictating an allocation of these transfers on the part of the provinces to those designated programs.

The task force says that interpretations differ—perhaps they do—but I do not think there is much room for doubt that the internal allocation which arbitrarily assigns these proportions, as the task force says, is not binding and cannot dictate to the provincial governments in their program decisions and in their spending decisions.

Just to complete the record, and in fairness, I should say that the task force does believe, would like to see and has recommended that post-secondary education and health portions be separated into individual payments. The task force would like to see that done in the future but it does describe the present allocations as being, and I quote, "notional"—and that is just what it is. So the accusations made on the basis that provinces are somehow not matching the federal government is quite invalid. If honourable senators read the statement made by the provincial Ministers of Finance and Treasurers back in April, 1983, when they reviewed the history of these negotiations, they will see how dubious this so-called allocation is between the two programs. I quote:

● (2050)

The percentage adopted by Ottawa for post-secondary education was 32.1 per cent, even though total provincial spending on this program at that time accounted for only 27.2 per cent. Since that time, cost pressures in the health sector have exceeded those in post-secondary education, reducing this percentage further to below 25 per cent on average with percentages differing somewhat from province to province.

I may say in parenthesis that it serves the purpose of the federal government very well to have this bill that would apply the six-and-five ceiling to the post-secondary education component. It serves the purpose of the federal government very well to insist that the post-secondary education component is 32.1 per cent and not some smaller percentage—because by inflating the portion of the transfer to which six-and-five applies, the federal government increases its savings. We have the old double standard again. Restraint is a fine and noble thing when it is imposed by the federal government, but when provincial governments, as a result of federal cutbacks, try to find ways to limit their spending, then those provincial governments are being reactionary and antisocial.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): “Distortions” is a better word.

Senator Murray: I beg the Leader of the Government’s pardon?

Senator Olson: “Distortions” would be a better word.

Senator Murray: For which of my expressions?

Senator Olson: To describe the ratios between the contributions of the two levels of government. They moved away from what was agreed to in the first instance.

Senator Murray: If the Leader of the Government wants to show me where there was an agreement in 1977 that it would be 50-50 or any other percentage, I would like to see it. I believe there was a commitment on the part of provincial governments to pay the money that they get in the block funding for health and post-secondary education, period. Those allocations are inventions of my honourable friend’s government, and they were made for the purposes that I have described in quoting the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. MacEachen.

In any case, the House of Commons task force on fiscal arrangements has also illustrated how dubious the allocation formula was. I quote:

Moreover although the allocation formula used by the federal government for EPF reflects the federal expenditure proportions that prevailed nationally in 1975-76, these proportions did not apply to any one province. Significant disparities existed because of differences in post-secondary operating costs across provinces, and consequent disparities in federal contributions. For example, in Quebec over 35 per cent of federal contributions for the three established programs went to post-secondary education in the 1975-76 base year, while in the three Atlantic provinces who chose the $15 per capita system—

That was an option that was open to provinces prior to 1977:

—barely 25 per cent of the federal contributions were for post-secondary education.

The Deputy Leader of the Opposition, a few moments ago, placed on the record the analysis of the House of Commons task force of some of the unfair accusations that are made against provinces—in particular the Atlantic provinces—as a result of the changeover from one formula to another.

The claim that after the changeover to the new formula the Atlantic provinces in particular should have immediately boosted their spending to somehow match what the federal government said it was doing, is demolished in one sentence:

Indeed such an induced increase in provincial spending on these established programs would have been contrary to one clear intent of the EPF arrangements themselves, namely to bring about a degree of spending restraint.

There is a great deal of unfair criticism of the provinces for the sake of winning political brownie points, I suppose, on the part of the federal government. Whatever the motivation, it is not conducive to good federal-provincial relations or to the provision of services effectively in any of these fields.

Provincial government treasurers have pointed out how cost pressures in the health sector have exceeded those in post-secondary education. One of the reasons, I suspect, for this is that federal legislation has closed off some of the avenues that might otherwise be open to the provinces for exercising restraint. But if honourable senators accept this arbitrary allocation of the federal government, and the finding that Senator Hicks and others make, that Ottawa is paying 100 per cent, more or less, of the cost of post-secondary education in, for example, New Brunswick, then, by the same allocation formula, honourable senators have to accept that in 1982-83—which is the year to which Senator Hicks referred—Ottawa would be paying only 41 per cent of health costs in that province as against 54 per cent in 1976-77.

If honourable senators believe, on the basis of this allocation formula, and as Senator Hicks indicated, that the federal government is paying 100 per cent, more or less, of the cost of post-secondary education in Prince Edward Island, then they have to believe that the federal government is paying 48 per cent of health costs; and, on a national basis, the federal share of post-secondary education costs would be 51.3 per cent, and of health, 39.5 per cent.

Again, the provincial Ministers of Finance and Treasurers made the point very clearly. I quote:

The federal government’s support of Canada’s health system is declining. While federal ministers continue to refer to a high level of federal contributions to post-secondary education resulting from the inaccurate split, they conveniently ignore the steady erosion of federal support for Canada’s health system. Even if one were to use the federal methodology, Ottawa’s support of total provincial health spending peaked at 47.8 per cent in 1979-80 and by 1982-83 had fallen below 40 per cent.

So, honourable senators, in the context of block funding, as it was conceived, as it was presented, as it was understood, as it was agreed to by the provinces and the federal government, the fair question, the relative question, is not whether the provinces are applying 32.1 per cent to post-secondary education and 67.9 per cent to health; the fair question is what is the total picture in terms of federal block funding, of provincial contributions to health and post-secondary education, taken together; and if we accept the federal government's definition of what Ottawa's contribution consists of—and I want to say a word about that in a moment—then the federal share of health and post-secondary education in 1982-83 nationally was 42.4 per cent. I have figures for 1983-84 for a couple of provinces. In New Brunswick the share would be 50.5 per cent and in Prince Edward Island, 55.8 per cent.

I wish to take a moment to refer to the federal definition of what its contribution consists of. I believe that something should be placed on the record about this. Honourable senators will be aware that the payment that is made to the provinces consists of the total value of the per capita grant to that province, reduced by the value of the tax room vacated by the federal government in 1977. The question is: Is that tax room vacated in 1977—those tax points vacated in 1977—part of the federal contribution to health and post-secondary education? The federal government, of course, says yes; but, honourable senators, these are taxes levied by the provincial governments on their taxpayers. The revenue is spent by the provincial governments. The provincial governments are responsible, I repeat, for raising the tax revenue and for spending it. They are responsible to their legislatures and to their electors and not, I may say, to the federal government or the federal parliament.

● (2100)

If you do not include the tax room vacated by the federal government in 1977, that is, the taxes that are now imposed by the provincial governments on their taxpayers, then the federal contribution to health and post-secondary education costs across the country was 21.3 per cent in 1982-83. That is the cash payment from the federal treasury for which the federal government is responsible and accountable to Parliament.

Senator Olson: What is the justification for leaving it out? I do not understand that argument.

Senator Murray: It is tax room vacated in 1977. These are income taxes imposed by the provinces on their taxpayers. If my honourable friend were a member of a provincial legislature and if it were suggested to him that, in respect of these moneys, the provincial government was not responsible to the legislature but, rather, to the federal government and to the Parliament of Canada, what would he say?

Senator Olson: That is ridiculous.

Senator Murray: Let me put it another way: During the war, the provinces rented tax room to the federal government.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Be more patient.

Senator Murray: They did not purport to say on that account, that the federal government was accountable to them for the conduct of the war, and the provinces did not continue to count the value of the tax room that they rented.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Olson: This whole speech is a series of distortions.

Senator Murray: The Leader of the Government will have ample opportunity, at second reading—or even at third reading, if he wants to reflect a while, and I hope he does—to deal with the points I am raising.

Senator Frith: If they are worth bothering about.

Senator Murray: I must say that I do not object too strenuously: If the federal government, for the purposes of political propaganda or public relations, wants to claim that these taxes imposed by the provinces on their taxpayers—this tax room vacated back in 1977—are part of—

Senator Frith: It was transferred.

Senator Murray: Transferred—it was vacated. Arguably, there would be double taxation.

Hon. R. James Balfour: He does not even understand the tax system.

Senator Murray: If the federal government, for public relations purposes, wants to claim that this is part of their contribution, that is harmless enough; they need all the help they can get and they are entitled, I suppose, to grab credit whenever they can and wherever they may. The problem arises when the argument is made that the provincial governments should be responsible and should be accountable to the federal government and the federal Parliament for the raising and the spending of this tax revenue within a province by that provincial government.

The federal government is responsible and accountable to Parliament for the cash payments to the provinces that come out of its own resources, out of the federal treasury, period.

Senator Frith: And that is what they give the provinces—what they raise from their own jurisdiction.

Senator Murray: The other night Senator Kelly raised another, not unrelated, point when he expressed a concern about how federal parliamentarians can exercise what he calls “our full fiduciary duty to the taxpayers of Canada by approving block funding arrangements which—as he said, “provide no information on how the funding is used by another level of government.” This, of course, is also, in part at least, Senator Hicks' concern.

I understand the concern, but I would say, first of all, that there is plenty of information available. The information is there in provincial budgets. It is there in the public accounts of the provinces. It is there in Statistics Canada as to how money is being spent and on what—health and post-secondary education. But if the concern is that Ottawa does not have enough say as to the detail of how these funds are spent on post-secondary education and health, then this opens up a whole new debate which honourable senators will be glad to hear me say is not a debate for this evening. It opens up a whole new debate about federalism, about respect for our Constitution and for the division of powers therein.

The problem for our country, in terms of the present and future tensions in Confederation, is not that the federal government is making unconditional grants to the provinces; the danger is that the federal government, by the use of the spending power—now, of course, having used it, they threaten to withhold it unless certain conditions are met—will try to exercise more and more influence and more and more power in fields that the Constitution has reserved to the provinces.

Senator Olson: Oh, that is a bunch of rubbish.

Senator Murray: The Honourable Robert Stanfield, Premier of Nova Scotia from 1956 to 1967, reflecting in a speech on May 14, 1984, in Toronto on the experiences in federal-provincial relations during the time that he headed the government in Nova Scotia, talked about the arrangements that were made in those years for revenue-sharing as between the two levels of government. He said:

Such revenue sharing was essential to the country. We might have adopted somewhat different formulae, but we had no alternative to substantial revenue sharing, unless we had been prepared to centralize constitutional responsibilities drastically in a manner that was no more practical or acceptable in the fifties and sixties than it had been considered a hundred years earlier.

Mr. Stanfield then went on to say:

Provincial governments, of course, preferred such unconditional revenue sharing—

After all, they have their own priorities, and conditional programs brought in by the federal government tend to destroy those priorities and, in fact, to create financial insecurity on the part of provincial governments when the federal government, some years down the line, decides to pull out of programs or reduce its support for programs that it inveigled the provinces into; but that is another story.

As Mr. Stanfield points out, the federal government prefers conditional grants because, as he said:

Ottawa naturally likes to get something it wants or believes the country needs, even within areas of provincial jurisdiction. But this use of the federal spending power has usually been an irritation and a concern to the provinces and always been an anathema to Quebec.

A little later, Mr. Stanfield said:

An unfettered spending power is hardly consistent with a division of powers. I recognize the role jointly developed programs play in our system of government, but the subject of safeguards on the federal exercise of the spending power, which was discussed in the great constitutional-discussion binge we had in the late sixties and early seventies, will have to be resumed some day.

That is quite a different perspective, a more long-headed perspective than that of some other people who think there is a terrible danger in unconditional funding by the federal government and in a so-called lack of accountability on the part of provincial governments to Ottawa for the spending of that money.

Proposed section 24.1 as set out in this bill seems innocuous enough, requiring, as it does, an annual report to Parliament by the Secretary of State on the cash and tax transfers contributed, as the federal government would have it, to post-secondary education, on provincial expenditures on post-secondary education and on other programs of federal assistance in this field. It then goes on to require the Secretary of State to report to Parliament on the relation between these federal contributions and Canada's educational and economic goals, and the results of any consultations between the Secretary of State and the Council of Ministers of Education on these matters.

• (2110)

Senator Tremblay, the other day, flashed an amber light when he saw this. It is little wonder that he did so because, as I say, the clause of the bill to which I refer seemed innocuous enough when the bill passed the House of Commons. On the surface it seems quite harmless. Since that time, however, what have we? We have the statements just placed on the record a few minutes ago by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, which statements are attributed to John Turner, Eugene Whelan, John Roberts, Serge Joyal—

Senator Roblin: I omitted to quote Mr. Joyal.

Senator Murray: The Deputy Leader of the Opposition omitted to quote the Secretary of State, Mr. Joyal. Senator Tremblay did so the other day.

Within the last few days, however, all of these ministers—or would-be leaders of the Liberal Party, some of them—have gone on record as advocating, in one form or another, increased federal intrusion by the use of the spending power in a field that is reserved to provincial jurisdiction.

Is it any wonder that people—unsuspicious people such as Senator Tremblay—are enormously suspicious? I think that all of these Liberal leadership candidates and ministers would do well to read the arguments made by Professor Pierre Elliott Trudeau in Cité Libre in February, 1957, in an article entitled: "Federal Grants to Universities." Although the article first appeared in Cité Libre, it was reprinted in the well-known collection of Professor Trudeau's essays entitled: "Federalism and the French Canadians."

Hon. D. G. Steuart: The Tory bible!

Senator Murray: I want to leave on the record one paragraph, for those who so slavishly follow the dictates—

Senator Roblin: Not any more!

Senator Murray: —or at least until June 11 will slavishly follow the thoughts of the great helmsman. This quotation is taken from what Professor Trudeau wrote in 1957, and he put it very well:

I cannot express it more concisely than F.-A. Angers: 'In general, the Canadian state is not the central government, but the central and the provincial governments taken together—In matters of education the Canadian state is the provincial state, and none other.'

Senator Frith: Hear, hear! That is the very spirit of Bill C-12. Now you've got it!

Senator Murray: I would like to have copies of that article reprinted—

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I have read it on many occasions.

Senator Murray: —and sent, for their edification, to Mr. Joyal, Mr. Whelan, Mr. Turner and Mr. John Roberts, who have had so much to say latterly, about the use of federal power in a field reserved to the provincial jurisdiction.

Honourable senators, the time is coming for a vote on the amendment of Senator Roblin. Of course, we all want to hear from the Deputy Leader of the Government, who is scheduled to speak. I said earlier that the only fair question to ask of the provinces, in the context of block funding, was whether the provinces are spending funds on health and post-secondary education taken together, as it was understood they would do. The answer to that question is yes. I agree that in the longer term the more important question that we all must ask and answer is whether the so-called tax transfers, the cash from the governments—federal or provincial—and the support from the private sector for post-secondary education is adequate. I take it that Senator Hicks says it is not. I am certain, from what they have said, that Senator Kelly, Senator Tremblay and Senator Roblin firmly believe that it is not. We will wait to hear what Senator Hébert has to say in this regard. I certainly agree that it is not adequate.

Honourable senators, that is a question that we must address, but I say in conclusion that this bill will simply make the financial situation of the universities and community colleges of this country worse than it is. That is a situation to be deplored and that is why I will vote without hesitation for the amendment of Senator Roblin.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am flattered and impressed to think that Senator Murray—and, he says, all honourable senators—are anxious to hear what I might have to say on the subject. I must say that I am tempted to think back to what Senator Nurgitz and I often heard a registrar say to a jury: “So say you all,” and I doubt that you do.

In any event, honourable senators, the point of the amendment is that it constitutes a “six-months’ hoist,” as it is called. Apart from the interventions that were made by Senator Roblin and Senator Murray on the general subject, the spirit of the amendment really is to proceed with the bill not now but six months hence. The only reasons for so doing would be a lack of time in which to consider it, or a lack of consultation, which allegations have been made by the opposition.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Well said.

Senator Frith: I think those allegations are unfounded. I think that there has been a great deal of conference, discussion, consultation and debate on this bill. The point of view of those opposing the bill has been canvassed in detail and, I say, with eloquence by members of the opposition in the Senate. I believe that no reason has been shown for the postponement of dealing with the bill at second reading.

Therefore, I ask honourable senators to defeat the motion in amendment.

Senator Flynn: Did you say “ask” or “direct”?

Senator Frith: Let the record show that I said “humbly request.”

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lapointe, P.C., that this bill be read the second time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word “That” and substituting the following therefor:

“Bill C-12, intituled: “An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977”, be not now read the second time but that it be read the second time this day six months hence.”

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say “yea”?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say “nay”?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the “nays” have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government):
Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I mentioned earlier, Senator Hicks gave me some notes regarding the points that had been raised last week in this debate. I have paid attention and while some of the points made by Senator Roblin and Senator Murray were not directly dealt with—particularly some of the data and statistics that they have offered—I will not, of course, repeat what Senator Hicks said but will simply share with you the comments he wished me to make on his behalf on second reading of the bill itself.

On the six-and-five guidelines to the transfer of payments relating to post-secondary education spoken to by several speakers, that, of course, as the speakers understood, is the very essence of the bill and constitutes its raison d'être or is very central to it. It should be noted that with the decline in the rate of inflation, the six-and-five limitations do not in fact involve nearly as much of a cutback as would have been the case with a two-digit inflation rate.

I think on that issue the lines are clearly drawn and have been expressed by Senator Hicks and by those opposed to the bill.

Senator Hicks points out that Senator Kelly and others felt that there had been insufficient consultation with the provininces. That, as we will recall, honourable senators, is a criticism which is nearly always made in relation to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. In fact, unless the federal government at some stage took a firm stand, it is our position that those arguments would never be resolved. Understandably, the provinces have a position and want to be able to restate it as often as possible.

In this instance, however, it should be noted that the Secretary of State entered into discussions with his provincial counterparts regarding federal government objectives in the post-secondary education sector and the most effective ways in which federal funds allocated to this purpose could be used. In order to ensure that these discussions took place expeditiously, the then Minister of Finance, in his budget of 1981, indicated that the government would have to re-evaluate the future of the post-secondary education transfers to provinces if satisfactory progress were not made.

As to the details of the consultation, the Minister of Finance met with the provincial ministers of finance and treasurers in December of 1982 to exchange views on economic conditions and prospects. At that time he indicated he had been informed by the Secretary of State that some progress was being made in discussions on post-secondary education. The Minister of Finance was therefore able to inform provincial ministers that it might not be necessary to introduce measures suggested by his predecessor in 1981. Indeed, he indicated that he would be prepared to see the per capita federal transfers to provinces for post-secondary education increase by six per cent in 1983-84 and by five per cent in 1984-85. This would bring them into conformity with the six-and-five program and the restraint measures that the government was applying to a broad range of its programs.

So there was advance notice to the provinces that these changes were imminent, and Senator Hicks does not believe that further discussion with provincial ministers would have resulted in any greater acceptance of this proposal.

• (2140)

Senator Hicks points out that Senator Kelly opposed the unconditional block grants which resulted after the 1977 changes in the established program financing arrangements. Senator Hicks wants me to say on his behalf that he has always disapproved of these unconditional transfers and he hopes and expects that the federal government will seek to change the basis of its support by transfer payments for post-secondary education as well as for insured health services.

Senator Murray: Does he say anything about negotiations on that matter?

Senator Frith: I have already covered that.

Senator Kelly's observation that the provinces have not taken advantage of these unconditional block grants is not borne out by the record of some provinces which have not transferred all of the federal moneys in support of post-secondary education to the institutions of higher learning in their provinces. Furthermore, as pointed out in Senator Hick's address on moving second reading, one province, British Columbia, though receiving additional funds in excess of six per cent and five per cent, is actually cutting back the grants to its universities by something between three per cent and five per cent.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): But Senator Murray did not deal with that matter.

Senator Frith: Senator Kelly commended the inclusion of section 9 in the bill but objected that it applied for only two years. I think Senator Kelly was mistaken on that point. Section 9 provides for annual reports to Parliament and is an ongoing requirement. The only portion of the bill which is restricted in its application to two years is the 6 per cent and 5 per cent limitations for the years 1983-84 and 1984-85 respectively. There was a suggestion that the provinces have been forced to cut back on post-secondary education. Generally, that is not correct, except for the province of British Columbia previously referred to. It is true, however, that the provinces have not increased their support of post-secondary education to the extent that some of them might have done if they had had greater federal transfer payments.

In view of Senator Kelly's reference to cutbacks on post-secondary education and health care, it should be emphasized that this bill makes no changes whatsoever in the funds transferred in support of health care or insured health services as they are designated in this bill.

Senator Olson: That is correct.

Senator Murray: Except by indirection.

Senator Frith: Finally, Senator Kelly suggests that provision should be made for private sector contributions. Of course, private sector contributions have always been and continue to be possible in support of post-secondary education, but I do not think we should expect federal legislation to make explicit provision for this kind of support.

Honourable senators, I ask for your support for second reading and the so-called "rump" as it has been termed by another is now free to vote.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for study and report.

Senator Roblin: And not the Youth Committee?

Senator Frith: The suggestion was made that we give consideration to sending the bill to the Youth Committee. I gave the matter consideration all during Senator Roblin's and Senator Murray's speeches but reluctantly found I was unable to agree.

Senator Asselin: Are you the one who decides? You are no longer the adviser, you are the chief!

Motion agreed to.

THE 12TH INTERPARLIAMENTARY MEETING OF DELEGATIONS
AT STRASBOURG, FRANCE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I give notice that next Thursday, May 31, 1984, I will call the attention of the Senate to the 12th Interparliamentary Meeting of Delegations of Canadian and European Parliaments held at Strasbourg, France, from March 26 to March 30, 1984.

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, for the second reading of the Bill C-11, intituled: "An Act to amend the Currency and Exchange Act".—
(Honourable Senator Charbonneau).

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I shall be brief. Bill C-11 is what is commonly called a housekeeping bill. The Currency and Exchange Act is not the type of legislation about which to get all excited. The dinner tables of the nation will not buzz with the news that this praiseworthy piece of legislation changes the name of the Currency and Exchange Act to "An Act respecting currency." But that is not the only change wrought by this busy little bill. Other matters of much greater import are also tackled. For example, you may have failed to notice this but the Canadian Exchange Fund Account continues to value its holdings at the former official price rather than the market value, which means that the government has not been acting legally for the past six years.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What else is new?

Senator Charbonneau: The purpose of this bill is to at least make an honest woman of this government by legitimizing the practice persisted in over the years.

The reason why we never went to valuation according to market value, as Senator Stanbury explained, is that gold prices have been subject to large fluctuations in recent years. Using market prices would have given the illusion of large changes in our reserves, even when no gold was being traded. Also, market prices are not, as Senator Stanbury pointed out, a reliable guide to eventual selling prices.

So there is good reason for amending the existing legislation to permit us to continue legally the practice of valuing our gold reserves according to the former official price. However, this bill also says that "gold shall be recorded at a value determined by the Minister." That means he can put any value he wants on that gold as long as it is less than the current market value. I see there some potential for playing with figures. If the fund is in bad shape financially and wishes to cover up, it can always value the gold contained in the account at a higher figure than the preceding year and, by so doing, give the misleading impression that all is well.

Senator Olson: Which this government would never do.

Senator Charbonneau: No, I am sure. I would appreciate it if Senator Stanbury would address this concern when he terminates this debate on second reading.

[Translation]

With respect to those gold reserves, another question comes to my mind. I would be very grateful if Senator Stanbury would explain to me what protection we have against a wasteful government which would seek to finance its ventures by dilapidating our gold reserves instead of imposing very high tax rates. In short, what prevents the government from selling off all our gold reserves, in principle?

As well, I would like the sponsor of this bill to tell me why the government now feels the need to use the services of an agent. Up until now, the government itself used to sell, lend or buy gold. Why now should it need to make that kind of deal through an agent? Would it be that the government has found that it is one thing, among many others, which it cannot manage to do properly?

In addition, since we are on this subject and Senator Stanbury surely has the answer, could he tell me what they mean in this bill when they say "sell, lend or otherwise deal in gold"? The expression "otherwise deal in gold" has me puzzled. What does this mean exactly? Are we going to be able to get into high risk operations?

I am certain that we are all very happy to see that the amendments proposed in this bill will give official recognition to the current practice of considering the profits made on gold trading as increases in value and of paying them into the Consolidated Revenue Fund over a period of three years as is the case for increases in value resulting from variations in the exchange rate. These provisions agree with the amendments made to the Currency and Exchange Act of 1977 where the distinction was made between net investment income and increases or losses in value and provision was made for transfers to the Consolidated Revenue Fund in such cases where the dealings are abnormal or irregular. Accounting changes have no effect whatsoever on the Exchange Fund Account. The Auditor General has stated that the amendments proposed will resolve the difficulties he had in his recent audits of the Exchange Fund Account.

All this is so exciting and I sincerely hope, honourable senators, that now that you are aware of the clever amendments contained in this bill, the taxpayers will no longer have any sleepless nights to spend waiting for the Government to act to legalize its actions at long last.

[English]

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Stanbury speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is really too bad, it was an interesting debate!

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, in answer to the questions raised by my colleague I have a remark or two.

● (2150)

The first question he raised was with respect to why the minister is given the power to value gold at any value up to market value. As I understand it, the reason is that the former methods of valuing gold have given way in other countries to this method. This allows flexibility to the minister within the range of values which might be chosen. Thus, it has become an acceptable method of valuing gold in a number of countries and it has been accepted by the Canadian government as being a reasonable method of handling the problem.

With respect to why an agency is used, I believe that can be satisfied by what I thought my colleague would have said for himself, which is that perhaps private handling of these matters is more effective than government handling. Frequently, the use of an agency has been found to be the most effective way of dealing with matters of a commercial nature.

The honourable senator's third question had to do with what was meant by "otherwise disposing of gold". My understanding is somewhat blurred in this respect except for the following explanation I received. There are now very sophisticated ways of handling these dealings, which are partly by sale and partly by loan. They are called "swaps" and involve disposal of gold one day for getting it back the next, or something of that nature. However, there are a number of newly formulated and sophisticated trading measures which have been developed which are not clearly covered by the other categories of trading.

I believe my remarks answer the questions raised by my colleague and, if my reply has been satisfactory, then I move second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Stanbury, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE OFFSHORE APPLICATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the second reading of Bill C-16, to apply the customs and excise jurisdiction of Canada to the continental shelf of Canada and to amend certain acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, on June 29, 1983, a Notice of Ways and Means Motion was tabled in the House of Commons to introduce a number of new customs and tariff measures affecting the offshore. These measures may be summa-alized as follows: First, the extension of Canada's custom and excise regime beyond the 12-mile territorial limit to a distance of 200 miles from shore or to the outer end of the continental shelf, whichever is farther; second, the elimination of the tariff preferences on vessels and floating structures from Commonwealth and developing countries; third, a reduction of five percentage points in the 25 per cent rate of duty on vessels and floating structures used for drilling; and, fourth, the clarification of the tariff classification of vessels and floating structures.

These measures, which came into effect on a provisional basis the day following their tabling, constitute the customs and tariff aspects of the new offshore policies announced by the government on January 6, 1983. They are designed to fill a vacuum in Canadian law and to enable Canadian manufacturers to compete fairly and equitably in supplying goods for the exploration and development of Canada's offshore resources.

Almost all oil and gas exploration activity on our continental shelf has taken place outside the 12-mile territorial limit and, until June 30, 1983, was not covered by our customs and excise laws. When the level of resource activity on the shelf began to increase, Canadian manufacturers found that in many cases they were not able to compete with foreign suppliers because many of these suppliers were dumping their goods or offering them at subsidized prices in this area.

In order to help rectify this undesirable situation and to exercise an element of our economic sovereignty over the offshore area, it was decided that Canada should extend to its offshore area the customs and excise legislation which applies to importations within the 12-mile limit.

Of course, careful consideration was given to the international implications of this action. Let me assure my fellow senators that the extension of the customs and excise regime is, in the government's view, fully consistent with international law and our international rights and obligations. Similar action was taken by the United States over 30 years ago and, insofar as we are aware, has never been seriously challenged.

The economic effect of applying duties and taxes to goods used in the offshore was carefully reviewed. While it was recognized that this action would increase offshore exploration costs, it was concluded that other factors, such as interest rates, oil and gas prices, and the supply and demand for offshore equipment, would have a much greater impact on the level of exploration activity. Furthermore, most of the increased exploration costs attributable to the new duties and taxes are offset by grants under the Petroleum Incentive Program and by tax concessions.

Extension of the customs regime should significantly enhance the ability of Canadian companies to supply some of the $1 billion worth of capital goods which it is estimated will be required each year for the next decade in the offshore. Without these measures, Canadian shipbuilders and other Canadian manufacturers would likely find it difficult to win many of the contracts for equipment and other goods used in the offshore. The extension of customs jurisdiction means that these suppliers will have the protection of regular duties, and also of anti-dumping or countervailing duties in cases where dumped or subsidized imports are causing them injury. With these measures in place, it is estimated that about $3 billion worth of installations and vessels required over the next 10 years for use in the offshore will be built in Canada without the need for additional government support. Customs jurisdiction extension should also result in increased Canadian sourcing of other goods used in the offshore.

● (2200)

This bill also amends the Customs Tariff to give effect to the customs and tariff aspects of the new coasting trade and shipbuilding policies announced by the government on January 6, 1983. It does this by eliminating the tariff preference on vessels and floating structures from Commonwealth and developing countries, reducing to 20 per cent the 25 per cent on duty on vessels and floating structures used for drilling and clarifying the tariff classification of vessels and floating structures to ensure that they are not entered under lower duty rate provisions covering machinery and apparatus.

In conclusion, I would like to state that the proposed Customs and Excise Offshore Application Act has received strong support from a number of industrial sectors, in particular the shipbuilders. It has also received strong support from members of all political parties in the other house. I hope that honourable senators will concur with my view that the measures contained in this bill are essential if Canada is to exercise economic sovereignty over resource related activities on the continental shelf, and that they provide an environment in which Canadian industry can compete on a fair and equitable basis with its foreign counterparts.

Honourable senators, I am asking my colleagues to join me in giving approval to this important piece of legislation.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, the government has not heard the last of this. In rising to move the adjournment of the debate, I simply express the hope that Senator Hastings will be here to face the music when the debate resumes, and not simply leave his notes with Senator Frith, as happened earlier this evening in the case of another bill and another honourable senator.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator Hastings reads better than Senator Frith, anyway.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

RULES OF THE SENATE

BREACH OF RULE 16(A)

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, before we deal with the business before the Senate, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are not paying any attention to one of our rules of procedure, namely, rule 16(a).

While I am no longer chairman of the Standing Rules and Orders Committee, and while I find rules rather boring, as the rest of you do, I think that unless we observe them to some extent the whole procedure in the Senate will suffer. So I call your attention to the fact that yesterday on three separate occasions rule 16(a) was ignored by members of the Senate. Rule 16(a) provides:

When the Senate is sitting, (a) senators shall not pass between the Chair and the Table;

I think that traditionally and historically, in order to protect the person of the incumbent of the Throne, it was established that no one should pass between the Mace and the Throne.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

GOVERNMENT POLICY—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to correct a statement I made yesterday in the chamber in response to a question raised by Senator Molson. Senator Molson asked whether or not a document I tabled yesterday entitled, "The National Film and Video Policy", was indeed the one referred to by the Minister of Communications. On verifying that after we adjourned yesterday, I found that that was the report to which Senator Molson referred. I simply state that now so that the record may be clear.

PRIVATE BILL

THE WESLEYAN CHURCH OF CANADA—FIRST READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury presented Bill S-15, to provide for the creation by amalgamation of The Wesleyan Church of Canada.

Bill read first time.

Senator Stanbury, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

YOUTH

FIRST REPORT OF SENATE SPECIAL COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Jacques Hébert, Chairman of the Senate Special Committee on Youth, presented the following report:

Tuesday, May 29, 1984

The Senate Special Committee on Youth presents its

FIRST REPORT

Your Committee, which was appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Canadian youth between 15 and 24 years of age, in obedience to its Order or Reference of April 10, 1984, recommends that the quorum of the Committee be four members.

Respectfully submitted,

JACQUES HÉBERT

Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Your Honour, am I to understand that we are being asked to give leave to consider it today?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is right.

Senator Roblin: We have not read it yet, so I think it should be considered tomorrow.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the only difficulty with that is a practical one. In view of the short time-frame for work of the committee between now and the summer adjournment under the present rules, the committee would like to have the opportunity to present its draft budget to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Hon. Jack Marshall: That committee meets tomorrow.

Senator Frith: That is right, and that is why if we wait to deal with it until tomorrow, the meeting of the committee will have taken place in the morning by the time we reach this order tomorrow afternoon. Yesterday when Senator Hébert was not able to be here to table the report we had spoken of having it done at the next sitting, namely, today. Since it is being presented now, if the Senate wishes to help the committee on the basis of presenting its budget to the Internal Economy Committee, then we would have to deal with it later today.

Senator Flynn: There is a shorter explanation. Don't spoil your chance.

Senator Frith: The shorter explanation deals with the length of the report which, as read by the Clerk, is quite short and we might have a chance to look at it between now and later this day.

Senator Flynn: The substance of the report is that it recommends that the quorum of the committee be four members.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, my leader has been provided with a copy of the report now, and I have had a look at it. Normally, I do not think it is sound practice to consider reports that have not been distributed to honourable senators so that they may at least read what they are supposed to be voting on and talking about; otherwise, it leaves this chamber in an invidious position. Looking at this report, I see that it contains four lines of no great significance. If the mover is prepared to read the lines aloud so that we can all hear him, I think we can pass judgment on his proposition.

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, the first report reads as follows:

Your Committee, which was appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Canadian youth between 15 and 24 years of age, in obedience to its Order of Reference of April 10, 1984, recommends that the quorum of the Committee be four members.

Senator Roblin: What has that to do with the budget being presented to the committee?

Senator Frith: Until that report is made and the committee has had its organization meeting to deal with many other things—this report deals only with the quorum—it cannot present its budget to the Internal Economy Committee on the basis of present procedures.

Senator Roblin: I am not prepared to argue with Senator Frith, but I find that quite unconvincing.

Senator Frith: I have found that my batting average on convincing Senator Roblin is not particularly high anyway.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Roblin: When my friend is right, he has no trouble with me. When he is wrong, that is when he runs into difficulties.

Senator Flynn: It is not the same thing trying to convince the opposition as trying to convince your own side.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like an explanation as to how the quorum of four members is broken down between the parties? Is a quorum of four provided for in the rules, or is it a figure manufactured as the deputy leader sees fit?

• (1410)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I had nothing to do with the establishment of the quorum. I did have something to do with the discussion with the opposition on how large a committee this should be in view of difficulties experienced in manning committees.

The total number of senators appointed to the committee was lower than normal, so it was on that basis that I assume the committee picked a quorum of four. Honourable senators, so far as the rules are concerned, there is no breakdown and the quorum may consist of all government or all opposition supporters plus the chairman. The membership of the committee is usually so divided, but it is not the custom to divide the quorum on a government-opposition basis.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: What about the independents?

Senator Frith: So far as the quorum is concerned, it is the same story for independents; except, occasionally, in the case of joint committees, the quorum is not divided on the basis of government or opposition supporters.

Senator Marshall: In other words, there has been a change in the rules. Matters concerning youth affairs were to be added to the responsibility of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. That has been ignored, and the Special Senate Committee on Youth has been formed. Under the rules, committee quorums were set at another figure.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Four.

Senator Marshall: It has been changed. I should like to have confirmation of what Senator Godfrey has just said, that is, that a quorum can consist of four members. Does that apply to every special committee?

Senator Frith: A committee will be entitled to meet on the basis of the presence of a quorum of four.

Senator Godfrey: My recollection is that when we reduced the size of the committees, we established that the quorum for a standing committee should be four. The same situation applies to special committees.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Aren't you lucky to have the support of Senator Godfrey?

Senator Frith: My biggest asset is my good luck!

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

CANADIAN SPORTS POOL CORPORATION

APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed either to the Leader of the Government or to the other minister, Senator Austin, who just happens to be with us today.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He is now and then.

Senator Asselin: Yes, now and then. My question has to do with the patronage system within the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation which comes under the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, the Honourable Jacques Olivier.

It would seem that appointments made within that corporation went mostly to people who have been friends and supporters of the party in office.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Unlike in Ontario where they are all opposition people.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: For instance, we have learned that one Jean-Guy Berthiaume, the former president of Mr. Olivier's riding association, has been given the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation distributorship for the Montreal region. It was certainly not sheer coincidence either that one of the appointees was Mrs. Marie-Andrée Bastien who used to be Mr. Lalonde's executive assistant; his former organizer, Mr. André Latour, was picked to be the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation Director General in Montreal. More revelations today would seem to indicate that this procedure has been systematically followed throughout Canada because, if I check the appointments in British Columbia—and that might interest my colleague, Senator Austin—Mrs. Dorice Talmy has been appointed manager of the sports pool for that province.

Senator Flynn: I do not know her.

Senator Asselin: Until recently, she was the president of the Women's National Commission of the Liberal Party of Canada. And then, in the same province, the management of the corporation appointed Mrs. Hendrickson who, until last Friday, was special assistant to Liberal Senator Austin, our colleague.

Senator Flynn: Ah!

Senator Asselin: Perhaps it was not pure coincidence either that those appointments were made. Mr. Ian Howard, former party public relations director and executive assistant to Minister John Munro in 1970, was put in charge of publicity.

Considering that this policy on the part of Mr. Olivier has raised some concern among Canadians generally, and particularly among supporters of the Liberal Party who certainly do not want to have anything to do with a shameful patronage system such as the one now used within the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation, could the Leader of the Government or Senator Austin enlighten us?

[English]

Perhaps Senator Austin could tell us if he has recommended his assistant executive to the Minister of Amateur Sports for the nomination she got last Friday. I would like to know whether he did make that recommendation.

[Translation]

I would also like to ask the Leader of the Government what are the required qualifications. How were the appointments made? Were the positions publicly advertised through the Department of Manpower and Immigration as they should have been? It seems to me that there are supporters of the Conservative Party and of the NDP who could also be looking for work. If next week the Deputy Leader of the Government is good enough to table the list of those who were appointed by Mr. Olivier or one of the ministers sitting in Parliament, this could perhaps throw more light on the procedure followed by the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We are trying to learn it all from Ontario's Big Blue Machine. We will learn in due course.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I hope that all honourable senators have grasped the significance of the expressed consideration of Senator Asselin, which is the most unusual assessment I have ever heard. He would seem to indicate that the only consideration of someone's merit or competence to do a job depends on his political affiliations of the past.

Senator Asselin: That is so in this case.

Senator Olson: While that might be the standard for his party, he should realize that we do not have the expertise in that regard that his colleagues have demonstrated.

Senator Frith: But we are trying to learn!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Smile, at least, when you say that; don't say that with a straight face.

Senator Olson: Senator Asselin should also realize that perhaps some degree of competence and expertise may come about because of the intelligence displayed in a person's political participation in the past.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: That was well said.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator should also understand that a competent person is not disqualified simply because, in the past, he may have given some support to a particular minister. My friend probably does not understand that. It seems amazing to me that that is the only criterion that enters his mind insofar as appointments are concerned. I can assure him that this party does not operate on that basis.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, the Government Leader's reply is ridiculous. I do not think that he is being serious when he gives this kind of answer. If he is really convinced that these appointments were based on competence and expertise, could he tell us about the qualifications of these people? What are the fields of competence or expertise that had them appointed to these positions so easily?

● (1420)

[English]

Senator Olson: That can be demonstrated. I do not have it with me at this moment, but I can tell the honourable senator that they are not disqualified because of the reasons he has given. But obviously that is foreign or unfamiliar to him.

Senator Asselin: I would ask the Leader of the Government if he can produce a list of members who have been appointed by the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport. Can he do that for next week, and could he table it?

Senator Olson: If it exists, perhaps that could be done. I am sure the honourable senator understands that such appointments are a matter of judgment, and he may not agree with the reasons, anyway. Obviously the government has to take responsibility for the competence of the people it supports—and that, of course, we do; and over the years that competence has proved to be at a very high level.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Look at the Senate!

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary question. If the Deputy Leader of the Government is unable or afraid to produce that list, he might produce the list of the Conservative supporters who have been appointed.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Asselin: He might find this easier. For that matter, the Honourable Jacques Olivier has claimed that he had appointed also a number of Conservative supporters. The Leader of the Government might find it easier to table the list of Conservative appointees.

[English]

Senator Olson: I am afraid I lost the significance of that question. If the honourable senator is trying to argue that by being a supporter of the Conservative Party it increases their competence and expertise, then I completely disagree with him.

Senator Frith: But it is no handicap.

Senator Asselin: Perhaps the Leader of the Government will answer my question: Did he recommend the name of his executive assistant to the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Thank you, Senator Asselin. The truth is that Bev Hendrickson, who was my special assistant in Vancouver, and who began employment with the Sports Pool Corporation this week, was an employee of Loto-Canada before she joined my staff. She sought to go to the Sports Pool Corporation. That was not in accordance with my desire and, in fact, I suggested to her that she should stay on my staff. I did not recommend it, but I did not stand in the way of her going, either. She has been a valuable member of my staff and I am sorry to lose her.

Senator Asselin: That was not my question. Did you recommend her—

Senator Austin: I said that I did not recommend her.

Senator Asselin: —to anyone?

Senator Austin: I did not recommend her to anyone, but I did not stand in her way. She found the job on her own.

The Hon. the Speaker: Delayed Answers.

[Translation]

SALE OF TICKETS

Senator Flynn: Mr. Speaker, I do not feel you should end too soon this phase of our operations, which is very serious, as everything else we do here in this House.

I would like to know either from Senator Austin or the Leader of the Government, the results to date of the so-called Sports Pool? I would be curious to know how many tickets have been sold for the first draw.

This information would be interesting, because we know the Government has suggested that the lottery was for connoisseurs only, people who know how baseball operates. It was not primarily a matter of luck, but rather knowledge of baseball.

[English]

Senator Olson: The required competence and expertise to do the job.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: This is what I would like to know: How many tickets have been sold, so that we may generally assess the intelligence of that segment of the Canadian public this lottery is very specifically aiming at?

[English]

Senator Olson: I do not have the actual number of tickets that have been sold, although I expect we can obtain the numbers up to a given date.

Senator Flynn: That is what I want.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators will realize that tickets are being sold continuously and, therefore, that we will have to specify a given day, such as today.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: May I now call the Orders of the Day, Senator Flynn?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): This is rather a matter of judgment, Mr. Speaker.

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the third reading of Bill C-11, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TAX CONVENTION BILL, 1984

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), moved the second reading of Bill S-14, to implement a convention between Canada and the United States with respect to taxes on income and on capital.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall begin by giving some background on something which has become, I suppose, axiomatic. It is so long since this particular convention has been thoroughly reviewed that we might not remember that the objective of such a convention is to avoid double taxation. The basis for that double taxation is that in the absence of any such convention there is nothing to prevent any jurisdiction from taxing either its residents on the basis of their income from abroad or foreign residents on the basis of income in their jurisdictions. Until such conventions were put into effect, Canadians who earned income in the United States had to pay tax on it in the United States and then, because they were residents of Canada, they also had to pay tax on exactly the same income according to Canadian tax laws. Of course, the same situation but in reverse was true for residents of the United States earning income in Canada. That is why the whole process of tax conventions, and the Senate has had occasion to deal with them with reference to countries other than the United States, arose. The two taxing authorities get together and agree about how to avoid such double taxation.

The particular bill before us, of course, does not attempt to invent the system for avoiding double taxation but merely brings up to date and puts into effect a review that has taken place to implement the double taxation convention between Canada and the United States. The implementing legislation is found on pages 1 and 2 of the bill. The bill is divided into two main parts. The second part deals with the convention, and "convention" is not to be confused with leadership convention but merely means agreement. When you and I agree it is called an "agreement"; however, when nations make agreements they are called "conventions". In a sense, the use of the word "convention" is really just a high class expression for the word "agreement".

The second part of the bill deals with the convention itself, which, in turn, is an agreement to update the earlier convention. Pages one and two of the bill are the operative parts implementing the convention.

The amending protocols, which is another term for the formal expression of a convention or agreement between nations, are found in Schedules I to III of the bill. The bulk of the bill deals with the protocols, or the actual expressions of the updated convention between the two countries. The implementing legislation does not contain a clause allowing the Governor in Council to give effect, by order, to future changes to the convention.

Canada-United States fiscal relations are presently governed by a tax treaty which was signed in 1942—some 42 years ago. Therefore, the potential for double taxation has not been in existence for a long time. I am sure it is clear to everyone that a tax treaty which has not been changed in more than 40 years needs to be modernized, even though most would agree it has been a useful instrument over the years. Thus, the big, bulky part of the bill before honourable senators will replace the 1942 treaty.

The convention is a balanced instrument which addresses a broad range of issues and problems affecting a significant number of individuals and corporations on both sides of the border. The new agreement before us has been under negotiation for some ten years.

I should like now to briefly highlight some of the points found in the bill which honourable senators might want to consider on second reading. The bill provides that the maximum rates of withholding taxes on non-residents may not exceed 10 per cent on direct dividends, patent royalties and technical know-how payments and 15 per cent on portfolio dividends; that is, dividends on stocks and bonds and other investments, interest and periodic pension payments. Under the existing treaty the withholding tax rates on non-residents are generally 15 per cent. Copyright royalties and certain interest payments are exempt from the withholding tax.

Income or profits from immovable property, or real property, including natural resource royalties—an important inclusion—may be fully taxed in the country where the property is situated. Gains arising on the disposition of certain property may also be taxed in the country where it is situated. In view of the fact that the treatment of capital gains represents a significant change from the existing convention, since tax on capital gains is relatively recent in our country, special rules are also included to avoid the disruptive effect of this change on investments existing at the time of signature of the convention.

The convention also contains a number of other important provisions, some of which I will highlight for honourable senators. The scope of the exemption for international transportation profits is extended; social security benefits will be exempt in the country in which they arise and only one half of their amount will be subject to tax in the country of residence of the recipient; and the deduction for contributions by a resident of one country to a university or charitable organization in the other country will be liberalized.

Special problems affecting border workers will be addressed. A good example of border workers would be those people who live in Windsor and work in Detroit, and vice versa. The two-year exemption for visiting teachers will be removed.

That listing, honourable senators, is not intended to be comprehensive but gives, I hope, an indication of some of the highlights and the types of issues that are dealt with in the convention.

Honourable senators, the convention will enter into force only after it has been ratified, and it will be generally applicable for the withholding tax on the first day of the second month following the date of ratification, and for other taxes on the—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What do you mean by “ratification”?

Senator Frith: I was about to mention that. Perhaps I could finish my sentence first—and for other taxes on the first day of January following the date of ratification.

Honourable senators, as I understand the law in the two countries, in the United States a treaty does not take effect until it is ratified. In our country it has been the custom for the government to report to Parliament on treaties, but formal ratification is not required. The point where Parliament normally becomes formally involved in a treaty is when it is to be implemented, if it is to be implemented. So I am using “ratification” in the special sense of ratification in the United States, and implementation by Canada.

Senator Flynn: That is what I wanted you to clarify, that when you were speaking of “ratification”, you were referring to what happens in the United States.

Senator Frith: I intended to do that. By way of digression, we have had a few problems about that. There have been, let us say, unsatisfactory experiences regarding ratification of treaties involving fishing rights, for example, but I doubt that that will be a problem here. Being concerned about the word “ratification” myself, as was Senator Flynn, I asked the question. My advice is that the United States is likely to be in a position to ratify the convention very soon, and it is important that Canada also be in that position soon, and therefore I commend this bill to favourable consideration on second reading.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I shall not detain the chamber long in offering a few observations on this bill, except to say by way of introduction that it is, in my opinion, a good idea that technical bills of this sort and complexity be introduced first in the Senate, not because we are more able to comprehend them in this chamber than they are in any other, but because our committee system gives us a good opportunity to examine the details at some length.

[Senator Frith.]

Second reading of a bill is intended to deal with the principles involved in that bill. If the principle of this bill is the regulation and, indeed, the minimization of double taxation between Canada and the United States, then it is a principle that I can certainly subscribe to. To that extent, therefore, there is no difference of opinion between my honourable friend and myself.

However, what is really in the bill is unknown, at least to me. The bill consists of 64 pages and has a large number of clauses and, besides the subjects mentioned by my honourable friend, it covers a great deal of other matters. To form any judicious opinion as to the merits of these various clauses is not something that can be done in a day.

However, our committee system will allow us to send this bill to, I presume, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and, at that time, that committee may call its own independent experts to examine both the accounting and legal implications of what is in this document. I operate on the assumption that that will, indeed, be done.

The second thing that our committee can do is to arrange for interested parties—and there must be quite a number of those—who want to make some comments about this bill with a view to making changes for the better, or even to delete some matters. That, I presume, will also be something that the committee will be expected to do. That means, of course, that there is no likelihood of our dealing with this matter in much of a hurry. It is too complicated and minute in its application for that. Therefore I hope that my honourable friend does not expect to get this bill back from committee in a day or two. It will certainly take some few weeks, I would suspect, to really digest what is in the bill and form a suitable opinion as to its contents.

However, that is the normal procedure in respect of a bill of this kind, and I expect that there will be no problem.

I should like to make a comment or two on ratification. I am pleased that my leader raised this point because that is something the Parliament of Canada is going to have to take increasing note of in that that involves the interests of the United States Congress as opposed to the administration. We have had a number of unhappy experiences whereby under our system we have committed ourselves without reservation to the implementation of an agreement between our two countries, such as that dealing with the east shore fishing problem that has already been referred to, only to find that the United States administration could not deliver. With the increasing interest Congress is taking these days, particularly in matters relating to economics or taxation, we can expect that this bill will receive careful scrutiny by the United States Congress as well as by our own Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

While this bill is not the kind that will create very much local pressure—which is usually the situation one finds oneself in down there when one cannot get international agreements through—it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that we might run into that problem.

If this bill is referred to committee, I will ask what the status of the bill is in the United States.

If that can be answered now, that would be better. It has been approved by the administration, no doubt. Has the United States administration any advice to give us as to what the attitude of Congress might be, because I would not want to labour on this during the summer months, if we are called upon to do so, to find that that labour was in vain. Perhaps these are matters that are more speculative than real at the moment, but they do represent a consideration which we must not lose sight of.

With those comments, I am prepared to support second reading of this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I was about to ask the same question to know just what happens to the bill, what are the chances that the American Congress might pass legislation as we do. I also wanted to point out that ratification does not exist in Canada. In our system, however, a convention or a treaty comes into force without parliamentary sanction, provided no law or amendment to the existing legislation is required. That is why in certain cases—for instance, treaties concerning boundaries which did not require legislation—those agreements were approved by the government without parliamentary sanction. They were not ratified by the United States, in accordance with their procedure.

In a case such as this one, it becomes necessary to legislate because this bill changes the Income Tax Act. Parliament must give its approval since the law is amended to meet the provisions of the convention. The remarks of Senator Roblin were very relevant indeed precisely because this bill amends the Income Tax Act. I am not quite as pessimistic as he is about ratification of this convention by the American Congress since it is in their own interest. It has no electoral or partisan connotations as may have been the case with treaties concerning borders or fisheries on the east or west coast. That was a bit different. It is a complex piece of legislation which serves the interests of both parties and does not raise contentious issues.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted to ask a question of Senator Frith, I should like to know whether he can tell us how long this tax convention between Canada and the United States will be in force? Is there a time limitation on it?

Also, does this treaty extend to the Possessions of the United States, such as the Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as far as I am aware, this convention effectively replaces the current convention and will be in force until amended, just as the current one is.

As to Possessions, my understanding is that this is an agreement between two countries dealing with their taxing authority, wherever that authority exists and, therefore, would cover the possessions of the United States, wherever they may be and wherever such taxing authority is exercised.

Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as Senator Roblin pointed out, this is the type of bill that should be referred to a committee for study, particularly the second part of it, and I propose to move that it be referred to committee if it receives second reading.

On the question of ratification, the information I have been given is that, as has been suggested, there is no question about the fact that a treaty that has been negotiated over a period of ten years has the approval of the administration in the United States, but, as Senator Roblin and Senator Flynn have pointed out, that does not necessarily mean that it has the approval of Congress.

The information I have is that the inquiries made regarding the status of the treaty and its likelihood of ratification were made with Congressional leaders which, to some extent, confirms what Senator Flynn has said. I assume that those inquiries were made by our representatives in Washington. By way of parenthesis, our current ambassador to Washington is the author of a text on treaty-making power which I recall studying for my diplôme d'études supérieures en droit. It deals exactly with this subject.

In any event, I hope that that answers the concerns raised by the Honourable Senators Flynn and Roblin at this stage.

As I said, I am going to move that the bill be referred to committee and perhaps at that time the officials can give us more detailed information on how it stands in terms of ratification, as well as some explanations as to the details of the convention.

So, honourable senators, I ask for your support on second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for study and report.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

THE WESLEYAN CHURCH OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill S-15, to provide for the creation by amalgamation of the Wesleyan Church of Canada.

• (1450)

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks because I think the history of the church is important and interesting. The purpose of this bill is to provide a legislative framework under which two churches, the Pilgrims Holiness Church of Canada and the Wesleyan Methodist Church of America in Canada, may amalgamate their corporate structures.

A brief explanation of who your petitioners are would seem to be called for, and, if I do say so myself, the origins of these churches are a fascinating mirror of historical events for the past two centuries in the English-speaking world. Both these bodies find their roots in the Wesleyan revival that swept England under the leadership of John and Charles Wesley in the years following their conversion to Christ in 1738. Both Wesleys were ordained priests of the Church of England and it was not their intent to originate another denomination. However, the major portion of those touched by their proselytizing were from the lower working class, unlettered and unchurched. Largely rejected by the Church of England, the Wesleys and their followers formed "methodist societies," a name derived from their methodical approach to the instruction of their converts. The methodist societies maintained some connection with the Church of England until the death of John Wesley in 1791, after which they organized under the name of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. At that time England was experiencing the beginnings of the Industrial Revolution. Some historians have gone so far as to credit the moral, political and social reforms that arose from the Wesleyan revival with saving England from the blood bath that was the French Revolution.

A religion of the people, methodism was active in missionary outreach to the American colonies. Following independence, the Methodist Episcopal Church was formed in the United States. In 1839 a large anti-slavery group within the church made representations against slavery at the general conference and was expelled from the conference by the bishops. This group formed the Wesleyan Methodist Church of America in 1843, notable for its adoption of its congregational rather than episcopal self-government.

In Canada, methodism was introduced from two sources. First, it came across the border with the arrival of the United Empire Loyalists following the American Revolution. They formed the Methodist Church of Canada, which ultimately became a founding church of the United Church of Canada. Secondly, English missionaries arrived representing the Wesleyan Methodist Church of England. Your petitioner, the Wesleyan Methodist Church of America in Canada, was thus the third wave of methodism to come to Canada. Its missionaries arrived to carry out their evangelical duties in the Ottawa Valley in the early 1890s, and the resulting church was incorporated 50 years later by private act of the Parliament of Canada in 1944.

Your other petitioner, the Pilgrims Holiness Church of Canada, is an heir to the "holiness movements" associated with early methodism in the Wesleyan Methodist Church of America and its growth in the pioneer camps. Out of the "holiness movements" arose many independent churches and groups, the growth of their numbers increasing inversely with the decline in emphasis on "holiness" in the mother church. Later, many of these independent churches and groups, all Methodist in doctrine and tradition, were to convene and merge for their mutual support and growth. One denomination that emerged was the International Holiness Church based in Agusa, California, a church whose doctrine continued to emphasize the evangelistic and holiness aspects of historic methodism. In Canada, the International Holiness Church fathered congregations principally in western Ontario. These were incorporated by letters patent under the Companies Act of Canada in 1920. The International Holiness Church in the United States having become the Pilgrims Holiness Church, the Canadian church became, in 1928, the Pilgrims Holiness Church of Canada.

In 1968 the Wesleyan Methodist Church and the Pilgrims Holiness Church voted to merge, both in the United States and in Canada, into one Wesleyan Church. The ecclesiastical merger was consummated immediately, but for various reasons the legal perfection of the merger in Canada has had to wait until 1984. The bill before you today is the legislative measure necessary in order to allow the merger to take place in law.

Honourable senators, I now turn to the contents of the bill. This bill is not a very complicated one. It begins by providing that the petitioners may amalgamate. The reason that Parliament must so provide is that the laws of general application now in force do not contemplate an amalgamation between a company created by private act of Parliament and one created by letters patent under the Companies Act. The remaining provisions simply provide for the objects, capacities and powers of the new corporate entity, its membership and management, its bylaws and its rights and obligations as a successor company. You will appreciate that these provisions must fuse the traditions of the church in these matters, as set out in a manual entitled The Discipline of the Wesleyan Church, with the normal requirements of law for the protection of members and the public.

Since this is a private bill, it will be necessary for a Senate committee to examine the allegations of fact set out in the preamble. In addition, the committee will no doubt want to review the text of the bill. I would propose, therefore, if second reading is granted, to ask that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Stanbury moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented in the Senate on 22nd May, 1984.—(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, this report deals with an order which was purported to be passed under the authority of section 2 of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. Section 2 of that act provides as follows:

The Governor in Council may by order grant authority to any board or agency authorized under the law of any province to exercise powers of regulation in relation to the marketing of any agricultural product locally within the province, to regulate the marketing of such agricultural product in interprovincial and export trade—

The fifth report of the committee reads:

The provincial Farm Products Marketing Act, R.S.Q. c. M-35, makes provision for the regulation of the marketing of wood products in the Province of Quebec. The purpose of the Order under Report is to grant to the provincial marketing boards concerned powers to regulate the marketing of wood in inter-provincial and export trade similar to those they already exercise in relation to intra-provincial trade.

You will note that although it is the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, they purport to give the authority with respect to wood. The report goes on to say:

Your Committee has considered the various definitions of "agriculture", "agricultural", "agricultural product", "farming operation" and "farming products" in the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, Jowitt's Dictionary of English Law and Black's Law Dictionary. None of these definitions supports the view that wood or wood products are agricultural products.

Your committee also considered a series of statutes which are listed in our report. None of these federal enactments are forestry products expressly treated as products of agriculture.

● (1500)

The report goes on to read:

On the basis of the foregoing dictionary definitions, of the definitions which appear in other federal Statutes, many of which are in pari materia, and in light of relevant judicial decisions, your Committee is satisfied that the ordinary grammatical meaning of the expression "agricultural product" does not include wood and wood products and that, consequently, the Governor in Council does not have the power, pursuant to Section 2 of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act to grant to provincial marketing boards authority to regulate the interprovincial and export trade in wood.

We wrote to the minister about this, and he replied saying he was prepared to consider the advisability of amending the act in a manner suggested by the committee. We wrote and said this should receive high priority and be done immediately because they were operating under an illegal regulation. In his reply, the minister reiterated his previous assurance but indicated his intention to delay the introduction of such an amendment until the need for other amendments to the act had been evaluated.

That is exactly the same attitude the minister displayed regarding the fourth report to which I spoke recently in this chamber. In other words, he has not specifically admitted that it is illegal, but it is quite obvious that it is. Everyone knows that wood is not an agricultural product; however, the minister thinks the regulation serves a useful purpose and therefore the fact that it is illegal is irrelevant.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You will never get that kind of commitment from a Liberal minister.

Senator Godfrey: I must say that I was somewhat surprised at the lack of publicity with respect to the illegal activities of the minister as disclosed in our report. With the exception of one article by Richard Doyle in the Globe and Mail, the press completely ignored our fourth report. Our committee does not have the power to force the government to do anything; the only real power we have is the power of publicity, and when we point out that somebody is operating, admittedly, illegally—

Senator Flynn: They don't care.

Senator Godfrey: —in a country that is supposed to be governed by some rule of law, you would think it would be of some interest to the press and to the people of this country. However, with the one exception I have mentioned, obviously there does not seem to be any interest in the press.

As I pointed out in my last speech, we made the practical suggestion that if the minister wanted to have it amended expeditiously—and we have no quarrel with him as to the object of the regulation—he can introduce a bill in the Senate. As we have said, the upper chamber is an eminently practical place to introduce minor legislative amendments of a technical nature that are non-controversial and do not involve the expenditure of public moneys; but nothing has happened.

I noticed in the paper today some reference to the Magna Carta. One of the provisions of the Magna Carta, which was passed many centuries ago, is that we operate under the rule of law. We are governed by laws and not by individuals. By carrying on illegally like this, they are contravening even the provisions of the Magna Carta, let alone the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Hon. David Walker: How right you are!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think that two propositions were placed before this chamber on a previous occasion with respect to problems of this sort. The first was that the Leader of the Government in the Senate or his deputy could introduce a bill in the Senate on his own hook. I was under the impression that the deputy leader rather liked that idea; at least, he smiled when I suggested it and intimated by a wink or a nod that he might take it up with his colleagues to find out if it was possible.

The second proposal was that the chairman of the committee could submit a bill on his own in this matter as a private member's bill, because it seems to me it might well qualify for that action if the government will not do the work on it.

Senator Flynn: Of course, Senator Frith will adjourn the debate.

Senator Roblin: He will adjourn it, but we do not know when we will hear from him again. I am sure he will have plenty of opportunity to consider the matter.

This situation reminds me of the functioning of the Senate in the Commonwealth of Australia because in that Commonwealth the Senate has a peculiar responsibility. It has the responsibility of dealing with all "orders in council" of the kind my honourable friend, the chairman of the committee, is talking about. The Senate in Australia has the power to deal with these orders and, if it wishes, to annul them. Every one of those delegated pieces of law-making authority now exercised in an untrammelled fashion by the bureaucracy, aided and abetted on this occasion by the minister, that body of delegated powers to make laws which, in Canada, entirely escapes the notice and power of Parliament—sometimes not the notice but certainly the power—in Australia comes before a properly constituted—dare I say it—"elected Senate," elected in the Commonwealth of Australia. That, to me, is a very considerable improvement over the situation we have in this country, and I cherish some hope that perhaps we may in due course—not tomorrow or even the next day—find that this Senate is clothed with similar legitimacy in terms of its law-making functions and similar authority to preside over this vast proliferation of delegated legislation which is, in effect, law-making by the bureaucracy. I do not know, but there may be 10,000 orders in council in the life and time of the present administration, perhaps more.

People ask me: What happens in Australia when the Senate has a responsibility of examining all this delegated legislation? Does it not result in a chaotic situation with nothing being done and the works being jammed up because they do not like what the ministers and bureaucrats are doing in the way of making orders in council?

The Australians are sensible people, and I dare say that we would be just as sensible if we were in the same position. The answer to the question is: No, the Senate of Australia does not use its powers in some irresponsible manner to interfere with the proper and legal operations of government, which include the use of orders in council to run the country; that does not happen. In fact, my information is that only on one occasion, at least in recent times, has an order in council been rejected by the Senate.

Senator Godfrey: Not one has been rejected since 1971.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: Not since 1971. Well, there is someone over there who knows what he is talking about. I think that is good.

Hon. Jack Marshall: It is a presumption.

Senator Roblin: It is a safe presumption on this particular point.

Senator Marshall: I doubt it.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is too harsh. In any case, I am going to presume that my honourable friend is right, that not one has been rejected since 1971. You may ask: How come? The answer is very simple: When orders in council appear on the horizon, which do not appear to be appropriate or have the sort of defects my honourable friend is complaining about now, the Senate takes the opportunity to let the author of this order in council, the minister responsible, know that if it comes to the Senate in that form, it may be subject to some debate, it may be objected to and it may be rejected. The ministers in Australia are sensible people and they respond constructively—which is more than we can say for our ministers—to that possibility. They make sure that the order in council which might be regarded as dubious is cured before it is presented to the Senate for approval.

That has to be a distinct advantage over our way of doing business in this country. It has the advantage of making sure that unsatisfactory orders in council are changed before they have a chance to do any damage or before they have a chance to break the law, as is the case in this instance. That has to be considered a plus. On the other hand, it places every one of those pieces of delegated legislation, which, in one respect, are the subversion of Parliament, before a properly elected body constitutionally empowered to handle them. The result is that they become no longer delegated legislation in the sense that we know it, but legislation which has in fact received the imprimatur of an elected parliament, the Parliament of Australia.

Honourable senators, that is more than I really intended to say when I rose to speak, but I could not help but share that interesting piece of information with those to whom it may be new. Apart from that, I think we have to have recourse to the good offices of the Leader of the Government in the Senate or his deputy to have a bill brought before us which will cure this matter. I am sure that can be done expeditiously and without any problem. It will receive support here on both sides of the chamber and could even, perhaps, be slipped into the mill in the other place and receive similar treatment there.

When my honourable friend adjourns this debate, as I understand he is going to do, I hope he will give serious consideration to this proposal which has been made to him.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in moving the adjournment of the debate, with your permission I want to mention that I agree there is similarity between this and the other report, and in furtherance of my undertaking regarding the earlier order I had an appointment with the Minister of Agriculture today.

Unfortunately, he was otherwise engaged and I have nothing to report as a result of that meeting.

● (1510)

I can only say to honourable senators that I am going forward with my undertaking to discuss this with the government and to get a reaction to the suggestion that was made in both the earlier report and this one to introduce a bill. I hope honourable senators will consider these two orders as being joined. I shall report further to the Senate in due course.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented in the Senate on 8th May, 1984.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to point out—or confess—that I neglected to move the adoption of this report when I last spoke to it. About half-way through my speech, I said I would move the adoption of the report. I understand from the Table that it is in order for me to do so now. Therefore, I move the adoption of this report.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are you referring to Order No. 5?

Senator Godfrey: Last week, when I spoke to the fourth report of this committee, I neglected to move its adoption. All I want to do now is move the adoption of that report.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It does not appear in the record that you moved the adoption of the report?

Senator Godfrey: That is right.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, this order stands in my name. I understood, when Senator Godfrey rose to speak to it, that his purpose was to move the adoption of the report. I moved the adjournment of the debate on that understanding. If any procedural correction is required, perhaps we can agree to it now.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps we can just have the record corrected.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Neiman, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Roblin: Your Honour, I think that that will get us into a little trouble. I would suggest that the Deputy Leader of the Government simply ask the Table to correct the record so that it shows what was intended.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The order will then stand in the name of Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: Your Honour, for some reason last week, when Senator Godfrey spoke to what now appears as Order No. 5, he overlooked moving the adoption of the report. I think we simply need to be sure that the record indicates that he intended to so move, and that such a motion was made. If all honourable senators agree we can move to the next order.

Senator Flynn: This means that the order stands today.

Senator Frith: The order stands today, but there will be no deficiency as a result of the motion for adoption of the report not having been made.

As Senator Roblin has suggested, let the record show that this has been corrected.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, moved the adoption of the first report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders which was presented on Thursday, May 10, 1984.

He said: Honourable senators will recall that on February 7 the Honourable Senator Sparrow proposed a motion concerning the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry and the work that was before it. There was some discussion at that time which largely revolved around the question of whether the committee could hear witnesses without having a specific reference to do so.

I understood it was the view of the Senate that that possibility should be extended to all Senate committees. It was recognized that the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee, in particular, had done this in the past. In most cases when it happened the circumstances were such that a group of agriculture producers happened to be in Ottawa appearing before a committee of the other place. It was felt that, if they had something useful to say to the Senate committee and since they were here in any case, they should be heard. The question was: Does the committee have the right to hear such witnesses?

The matter was then referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Simple as it may have appeared, it did not turn out to be quite so simple when we started to look into the details. There were five meetings of the full committee and two meetings of the steering committee on the subject, much to the surprise of all of the committee members, who thought the matter could be dealt with quickly.

The problem that arose was one of precedent. The committee could not find any simple wording by which to recommend to the Senate a change in the rules, which wording would not, in our view, create additional problems in terms of establishing precedents and possibly leading to abuse at some point.

Therefore, in order to protect the Senate against a rule that could be embarrassing in future, the recommendation of the committee is not to change the rule but to follow what is recommended in our report, that is, that the Senate adopt a motion with specific reference to each session allowing, for the purposes of that session only, that persons who are visiting the national capital region be heard by any committee on a matter that is already within the ambit of that committee. The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders does not seek to change the Rules of the Senate.

There was a second element with which the committee did not deal because it was felt to be a budgetary matter which properly belongs to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Therefore, this committee's recommendation, as it appears in the report, is not to change the rule but simply to have a motion passed by the Senate empowering committees to hear witnesses if they are in Ottawa and if there are no additional expenses involved.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

SENATE REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate, tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1984.—
(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Order No. 9 stands in the name of Senator Macdonald. I believe that Senator Stanbury mentioned to him, as he did to me, that he would like to speak to this order today. Is that satisfactory, Senator Macdonald?

Hon. John M. Macdonald: That is perfectly satisfactory, yes.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I very much appreciate the opportunity to make a contribution to this important debate.

Since the days when I studied constitutional law under the great Bora Laskin and learned the practical side of constitution building from Sir Allen Aylesworth, who was, at one time, the Canadian counsel on the Alaska boundary dispute, I have had a fascination with the difficulties of Canada's constitutional structure.

The Senate gave me the opportunity of chairing the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution during the years 1978 and 1979 and of chairing the subcommittee of the Lamontagne committee, which, in 1980, again dealt with recommendations for the reform of the Senate.

[Senator Molgat.]

● (1520)

It has been a matter of regret for me that the recommendations contained in those reports have never been acted upon. Nevertheless I entered with optimism into the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Reform of the Senate in 1983. Unfortunately an untimely illness prevented me from completing my tour of duty as a member of that committee and I was not able to participate in the formation of its recommendations.

However, I have continued to mull over our needs as a nation, made more complex by our federal structure. Recently, I have begun to understand that my experiences of the last 10 years in working with democratic political parties in various parts of the world, and in my efforts to promote our export trade, have added urgency to my search for solutions to the weakness of our federated parliamentary system. I have realized that we cannot go on like this. We must find a way of getting our act together. Our international customers and international friends are puzzled to find that we have 11 sets of trade policies and laws, frustrated to find that we have as many non-tariff barriers between provinces as we have with our trading partners, confused by the plethora of ministers who visit them with competing demands, and nonplussed by the conflicts and overlaps in our laws.

It would be sad enough if these circumstances only caused consternation to our foreign friends, but when they are the principal cause of our relative standard of living dropping from second to eighth place in the world, it means we are frittering away our general prosperity and the individual well-being of our people.

It may be trite but it is true that Canada is the most fortunate land in this world. With huge resources, access to the best of technology, an educated and inventive work force, the finest program of social security, a rich multicultural and linguistic heritage, we really have no excuse for not being leaders in the world.

Our only drawback is that we have never learned to work together. Part of the reason for that is that the institutions through which we express our federalism encourage confrontation rather than co-operation. Mr. Pearson's idea of "co-operative federalism" was a good idea, but the institutions were not there to make it possible.

There is nothing very much wrong with our Constitution. The powers are divided between the federal and provincial governments. There is some overlap and trading back and forth of functions and powers, and disagreements on legalities are settled either government to government or by the Supreme Court of Canada. But that is a very negative way to approach co-operation. Settling the legalities does nothing to bring about co-operation and national unity of purpose. What is needed is some institution in which we can come together for the purpose of co-operating, for the purpose of respecting each other's values and priorities, and through statesmanlike efforts, causing them to coincide into a national direction and force.

I believe that the Senate can be that kind of an instrument for the Canadian people—not because the individual senators will be saints, but because, if we construct it properly, that will be the mandate for which the people will hold them accountable.

My purpose is to show that there is a need in Canada for a forum in which the policies of both the central government and the provinces can be discussed with regard to their effect upon each other, and how they will enhance the standard of living of Canadians in general—the thesis being that the lack of such a forum is one of the main reasons why Canada has fallen behind other western nations in economic activity, when it should be setting the pace, bearing in mind its great wealth in natural resources and the opportunities for employment which should be produced by such wealth.

The conclusion is that rather than establish a new institution which would have responsibility for intergovernmental affairs, the existing Senate should be restructured and given a specific mandate to deal with federal-provincial relations. The Senate would become the focal point for the day-to-day ongoing relationship between the provinces and the central government.

In a recent book, Professor H. G. Thorburn argues that Canada has been severely hurt, both with regard to its internal economy and its international trade position in recent years, because of the lack of an effective institutional mechanism through which both the provinces and the central government could co-ordinate policies, especially in the economic sphere. He compares Canadian performance particularly with that of West Germany and peripherally with that of Japan, and concludes that the intensive economic planning that occurred, combined with the willingness to carry out these plans, contributed greatly to the increased economic influence of these countries during the period following the Second World War. He concludes that a new institution should be developed in order to deal with this dilemma in Canada. However, there is no reason why his thesis and analysis, which are supported by others, cannot be used as the basis to recommend that an existing institution be reformed so that it can review and co-ordinate policy in areas affecting both provincial and federal governments.

A need for planning is obvious as the national and provincial economies become more and more interwoven in a web of interdependence. Effective planning would at least ensure that the efforts of one level of government do not frustrate those of the other.

It should also be recognized that there is a definite need for the federal government to take a strong lead in financial matters. This was even recognized in the report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity, in which it was stated:

We see the essential role and responsibilities of the central government . . . to control the major instruments of economic policy, to oversee interprovincial and international trade, and to stimulate economic activity within the federation. In addition, because the resources and economic advantages of Canada are not spread evenly throughout the country's ten provinces, the central government must be in a position to assume equitable benefit sharing for all Canadians. This means that it must have a responsibility for combatting regional disparities, establishing appropriate minimum standards of living for all Canadians where appropriate, and redistributing income between individuals and between provinces.

While the economy seems to be the main area where more effective consultation and co-operation between the provinces and the central government would show an immediate benefit, there seems to be general agreement among the commentators that an institution has to be found within which all currents of opinion can be expressed during the policy-making process, with the institution also contributing to the achievement of compromise.

Perhaps the problem or dilemma is best stated in the writing of Professor R. M. Burns, when he states:

The rapidly increasing complexities of modern political economy make the continuation of the present struggle (between the provinces and the central government) a luxury the country could do without. Our attempts at co-ordination in the fields of fiscal and economic policy have been singularly slow and unsuccessful. We have made little progress since the ideas of co-operative federalism first began to be discussed.

I believe that the Senate can be restructured to reduce federal-provincial legislative conflict and at the same time to encourage common legislative action toward national objectives. The challenge is to explore the nature of Canadian federalism to discover whether such an institution would be a positive building block in the construction of the future of our nation.

The definition of Canadian federalism, which I submit most closely approximates the political situation in Canada today, is advanced by Professor Richard Schultz:

Since the end of World War II, Canada has evolved to the point where its dominant characteristic is no longer that of two levels of government separate and co-ordinate—rather, what we have in Canada . . . is a system of separate levels of government sharing power.

With this as the operative definition of federalism, it should be axiomatic that there be an institution to facilitate the mechanics of “sharing power” as well as to resolve difficulties which may arise. However, the structures of the central government which were originally designed to give the regions a voice in the central government's policy-making process have not functioned effectively. As well as the Senate not playing its regional representation role, the political party system, because of intense party discipline, militates against MPs setting out regional concerns in the House of Commons, even though they may express them strongly, but privately, within their regional and national caucuses. The electoral system allows a party to form a government without representation from significant areas in Canada, and this results in a lack of significant regional representation in cabinet.

Even with the appointment of senators to cabinet positions there is a public perception that representation of regional interests is lacking in government. Coupled with this failure is a growth of power and influence by the provincial governments which has, through decentralization of power, restrained the central government from establishing a national consensus in areas where it is needed the most.

It is also realistic to conclude that no matter what changes to the system are implemented, they will not replace the Federal-Provincial Ministers' Conference. This is because of the attendant publicity it affords to all participants, especially the provincial premiers, the major point for them being that they are portrayed as equals with the Prime Minister in public bargaining sessions. However, the first ministers might be free to put this prestige to more constructive use by agreeing on national objectives if another institution were there to support and advance their positive effort.

The type of co-ordination of policies between governments which has to take place, especially in economic fields, can best be accomplished by the utilization of an existing institution. A Senate reformed in such a way that it does not lose its ability to provide the sober second thought on legislation seems to be the most practical and may eventually be the most effective solution.

A review of the most recent proposals for Senate reform, that is, a reformed appointment process, or a Bundesrat, or indirect election as proposed in Bill C-60, indicates that they do not result in an institution which can deal effectively with federal-provincial relations. Any process by which senators are appointed affects the legitimacy of the institution to act effectively on important legislative matters. I have come to the conclusion that it is too late in the day to expect the appointment process to give senators an adequate mandate to represent the people of the provinces and territories.

The Bundesrat type of proposal for reform is probably the most attractive to the provinces. It would allow the provincial governments to send delegates to Ottawa who would have input into federal legislation affecting the provinces. However, it is obvious that such a Senate would become an entrenched opposition to the central government. Those who oppose the Bundesrat idea have accurately characterized it in our parliamentary federation as a "House of Obstruction." The Bill C-60 proposal would result in both federal and provincial political parties being represented in a new second chamber but the chances are slim that one party would ever have a majority. The Bill C-60 model is fraught with difficulties. Its powers are not strong enough to require the views of the regions or the provinces to be seriously considered. There is a problem of a lack of continuity of membership which would probably lead to a lack of consistency in dealing with legislative matters. Finally, it is argued that it would be by-passed by the provincial governments who will still want to present their own positions directly to the central government. While recognizing that countries such as Germany and Australia use institutions outside Parliament for a great deal of their federal-provincial negotiation and co-ordination, it is my submission that the resolution of these conflicts in Canada can best be accomplished within the structure of the central Parliament. It is more feasible to adapt an existing institution to new purposes than to create a new institution to preform the federal-provincial negotiation functions.

It is my proposal that the Senate be elected. One half of its members would be elected at the time of provincial elections, with the other one half of its membership elected at the time of a national election. This should provide a chamber which reflects the views of both the provincial and national electorates.

The members will be elected on the basis of proportional representation under a system similar to that used in Australia. While the political parties in each election would have the opportunity to put their candidate on the ballot, voters will be allowed to rank their preferred candidates. The ability of voters to indicate their preference for a particular candidate or candidates will lessen the impact and influence of political parties on the election and avoid the perpetual election of the senior candidates of each party, as happens in Europe.

I share the opinion of the joint committee that constituencies should be established in a province. This would protect the rural voter from being submerged under the votes of the more populous urban areas. It would also allow for the representation of minority groups. The fact that the provincial members of the Senate would be chosen at the time of the provincial elections would militate against the involvement of the national political parties and favour the participation of the provincial political parties. The provincially elected senators might each represent a constituency composed of a number of provincial ridings. The federally-elected senators might each represent a constituency composed of a number of federal ridings. This special relationship to the legislators elected to the lower house in each case would enhance their contact with the region and their ability to represent it.

It might also be presumed that provincial premiers, aware of their close party connection with a number of provincially elected senators would see the system as a reasonable compromise between a chamber of which all members are provincially elected or appointed and a chamber of which all members are federally elected or appointed. Senators would hold their seats through two elections—normally eight to 10 years in the event of majority governments—or a minimum of six years, running for election at the first general election held after the expiry of six years. That is long enough so that the expertise and experience that is necessary for senators to perform their legislative review function would still develop. They would be eligible for re-election.

I understand the reservations of the joint committee with respect to proportional representation. It is my hope that the nature of my proposal overcomes some of those reservations. In any event, I am sure that first-past-the-post elections will not satisfy the need to give more comprehensive representation to the many elements of our society—political, demographic and geographic. The other need is to distinguish clearly the mandate of senators from that of the members of the legislative chambers—the chamber of confidence.

It is not proposed that this newly constituted Senate would be a confidence house, but would exercise suspensory veto power. A specific period would be required to elapse after a matter had been dealt with by the Senate before it could be re-submitted for approval. This would allow public opinion to crystallize prior to the matter again being discussed in the appropriate legislature. It may be claimed that such power will give the Senate no means of enforcement of its decisions. However, I believe that the respective governments would accept no Senate power more severe. I also believe that public opinion is the best enforcer. Rejection of a bill from a federal or provincial house will create public discussion and the opportunity for public action.

The subject of distribution of senatorial seats across the country is well handled by the joint committee. Certainly the west needs more representation and representation should be weighted toward the less populous provinces. Otherwise, I have no new proposal.

The major innovative feature of this proposal is that the Senate, in addition to its present review of federal legislation, would have the power to review provincial legislation which affects the powers of the central government or the rights of other provinces. It has been the major premise of Senate reform for some time, especially with those who advocate a Bundesrat type of Senate, that there should be provincial input into federal legislation. The proposal here is that in areas where provincial legislation affects either other provinces or the central government it should receive the scrutiny of the Senate and be subject to a suspensive veto.

It is obvious that, if we are ever to develop any kind of national will in our federation, provincial legislation which has the potential to affect the national economy, would have to be scrutinized by someone to ensure that its effect is to advance rather than frustrate that national will. This is because we have a national economy, with a common currency, common tariff, common foreign exchange rate and a national fiscal and monetary policy that has at least some force. That means that economic disturbances in some regions and sectors in the economy are transmitted to other areas. No one province can wield control over money, tariff, or exchange rates so as to insulate itself from the harmful spill-over effects of actions taken for short-term reasons elsewhere. Astute multi-national corporations can play one province off against the other in a competition for investment and still have constitutionally guaranteed access to the other province's market. That kind of economy requires a federal institution conscious of the needs of the regions to draw attention to contradictions and inconsistencies on behalf of citizens of the country as a whole.

● (1540)

Other areas where provincial legislation would be submitted to the Senate would be in interprovincial fields touching on transportation and communications. Matters such as education, health and social welfare programs are examples of provincial areas which could affect the central government or other provinces as well. Also matters such as energy regulation could be termed to be related to the national economy.

The Senate could also be involved in those areas contained in section 36 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which deals with the commitment to equalization and the ending of regional disparities in Canada. This is an instance where the Senate could look at the provincial aspects of federal legislation with a view to determining whether it fulfills the mandate set out in that section.

This work could either be done by the Senate as a whole or through the establishment of a federal-provincial relations committee. It could also take place through the informal submission of relevant proposed provincial legislation to the Senate for scrutiny prior to its enactment in the particular province. This newly formed Senate would be ideally constituted to review and approve appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada and to the federal regulatory agencies which deal with regional concerns.

It was proposed in the Lamontagne-Goldenberg Report that the Senate assume the function of reviewing laws with regard to their effect on human rights, language rights and minorities. This could now be done with regard to both provincial and federal legislation.

A major benefit of this proposal is that the areas where the Senate has been most effective will still be retained. That is, this body will be well suited to carry on both the legislative review role and the role of investigation in which the Senate has figured so prominently in recent years. The mix of national and regional representation would make it ideally suited to investigate matters of national importance such as the economy and matters of regional importance such as the impact of offshore drilling and the implementation of federal-provincial agreements. That investigative role could be extended by a positive mandate to proposed national objectives, common legislative programs to advance them and compromises to resolve existing conflicts.

Legislation might be studied in the Senate as a result of:

- (a) Request by a province other than the legislating province;
- (b) Request by the legislating province;
- (c) Request by the federal government;
- (d) On the initiative of the Senate itself; or
- (e) As a result of a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Some consequential changes may be necessitated because of the new mandate given to the Senate. For example, to maintain local flexibility with regard to law making, it may be necessary to formally establish a constitutional arm of the Supreme Court of Canada so that it could be quickly determined whether an area upon which a province has legislated or intends to legislate affects the national or extra-provincial interests.

It is obvious that a scheme such as that set out above would result in disputes as to whether proposed provincial legislation affects another province or the national interest, or is simply an example of a province carrying out its mandate to deal with local matters. It will be important that such disputes be dealt with relatively quickly by the Supreme Court. Consideration should also be given to the removal of the powers of disallowance and reservation from the Constitution.

While this scheme is new in many aspects with regard to Canada, it would seem to have many of the attributes of the Australian Senate. The length of the senatorial term and the method by which senators are elected are somewhat similar to that used in Australia. Although the Australian Senate was originally designed as a states house, it has never really functioned as such because of the influence of political parties. It is the proposal here to limit the influence of political parties through both the electoral system and by virtue of the fact that the national political parties will only be involved when senators are elected at the time of a federal election. The influence of the provincial political parties will be felt most strongly at the time that senators are elected during provincial elections.

Senator Frith: That would be under the provincial chief electoral officer?

Senator Stanbury: Yes.

The fact that senators will be elected only at alternate general elections will have a similar effect.

This scheme should result in the strengthening of Canada as a whole, because it will provide a forum, which is presently lacking, for the discussion of problems affecting both the provinces and the central government. The use of an existing institution to accomplish this goal gets away from the problems of trying to construct a non-parliamentary agency and attempting to determine what influence that agency would have should some governments not contribute to its establishment.

The two main methods of dispute settlement between the provinces and the central government are at present the federal-provincial conference, which is preceded by numerous bureaucratic meetings, or, alternatively, the referral of a dispute to the Supreme Court of Canada for determination. Neither of these methods presents a very positive approach.

It is the opinion of Professor Donald Smiley that intergovernmental affairs agencies appear to contribute to federal-provincial conflict rather than accommodation. It is his feeling that the thrust of federal-provincial relations agencies is to link narrower purposes with broader and more political ones. With respect to the latter, it is less likely that the federal and provincial governments will agree. The implicit and singleminded purpose of intergovernmental affairs managers at the provincial level is to safeguard and, if possible, to extend the range of jurisdictional autonomy, including, of course, the revenues which provinces have under their unshared control.

The other major forum for dispute settlement is the Supreme Court of Canada, which, by its very nature, will apply a legal solution to a political problem. While in some instances this may facilitate negotiation, it can also make further negotiation very difficult for the party which has lost the case before the Supreme Court.

[Senator Stanbury.]

There are also those who argue that Canada must come to the brink of disaster before any meaningful Senate reform will take place. The thought is that there is simply not enough in it for both the requisite number of provinces and the central government to reach agreement. The central government would simply find it unthinkable to accept a Bundesrat type of Senate to which the provincial governments send delegates to Ottawa to vote on federal legislation. Alternatively, why would the provincial governments accept anything less than a reform which would lead to their having direct influence over the legislation of the central government?

The arguments for accepting reform have to be advanced on a higher plane than pure self-interest. The provinces and the central government have to realize that all will gain when regional representation in Ottawa is enhanced.

The argument has to be that the type of proposal advanced here is beneficial, as it gives the provincial electorate and provincial political parties, if not the provincial government, through the voting process, direct input into the legislative process of the central government.

The regional interests of the provincial electorate will be represented in the Senate, as well as the views expressed by the national electorate. Also, this type of scheme will result in the provinces being able to influence the policies of their provincial neighbours for the first time.

It will open up the federal-provincial process to public and interest group involvement as these matters will now be dealt with in a public forum. Previously, there has not been an opportunity for the public to become involved in intergovernmental relations through the making of submissions and appearing before committees involved in this process. With this proposal, at least, a forum is provided through which the legislators will be made aware of alternative perspectives.

Even though provincial governments will not have direct representation, the subject matter being treated in the Senate will require full access to the Senate's committees by provincial governments. Senator Godfrey has been trying valiantly for two years to have that access assured and formalized. This proposal would make the Senate very important to both the federal and provincial governments. They would ignore it at their peril. On the other hand, senators elected as members of provincial parties will gain the opportunity to affect federal legislation and the legislation of other provinces. They will also enjoy the satisfaction of contributing to the unity of the country and the force and direction of the progress of the nation. I have every confidence that they will love and serve Canada with the same devotion as their colleagues.

• (1550)

Honourable senators, I believe that we will not mature further as a nation until we accept the need to submit collective legislative actions, insofar as they affect each other, to some institution representative of our electorate in both its regional and national interests. Governments, as such, find compromise too difficult. Elected representatives, one step removed from government, with a specific mandate to soothe our conflicts and encourage our common efforts will provide the voice of wisdom and moderation which we must have to create the great future our people crave and deserve.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Stanbury if he would elaborate on how his proposal for an elected Senate would guarantee adequate representation of Canadian minority ethnic groups in the Senate?

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I think that the only answer to that is that no one can guarantee the opportunities for minority groups. However, minority groups must have some basis for developing an electoral constituency and approach. That is why I believe that a constituency system is the only one which allows that possibility. If you simply end up with a list of people for a whole province, then the likelihood is that the minorities will not be properly represented.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

MR. AURÈLE CHÉNIER, ASSISTANT EDITOR OF DEBATES
(FRENCH)—FELICITATIONS ON RETIREMENT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, before we continue and while Mr. Aurèle Chénier is still here at the desk of parliamentary reporters, I would like to mention that he will be leaving us after 24 years of loyal service in the Senate, including the last few years as Editor of the French Debates of the Senate.

It is with deep regret that we francophones see him leave. We will always remember his dedication, his assiduity and his outstanding work; for the francophones who sit in this House, it will stand as a guarantee of the lasting official bilingualism which characterizes this country.

On behalf of the official opposition, I extend to Mr. Chénier our best wishes for a happy retirement and good health.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as spokesman for my English-speaking colleagues and the government as well as in my own name, I fully endorse the wishes expressed by my colleague Senator Asselin. On a personal note, I might add that Mr. Chénier has also been for me as an anglophone a kind of linguistic adviser, for now and then I would meet him in the hallways and consult him about matters of French usage to know how I might become more proficient. I always received good advice.

It is with great pleasure that I join Senator Asselin who has given us the opportunity to extend to Mr. Chénier our congratulations and appreciation for his years of very faithful and competent services in the Senate.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES OF CANADA

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—
DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Aboriginal Peoples of Canada;

That the Committee be composed of eight Senators;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.—
(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this motion presented by Senator Watt deals with the desirability of establishing a special committee of the Senate, as the motion states, to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing aboriginal peoples of Canada. Honourable senators will remember that Senator Watt in his speech in support of the motion dealt with the role of the Senate in aboriginal affairs, the need for new forums on aboriginal issues, the infrastructure questions concerning aboriginal peoples, rationalization of government policies, responsibilities and relationships with the aboriginal peoples of Canada, economic and financial relationships, and possible specific functions and issues for a Senate committee on aboriginal issues. That is a fairly full plate, as we can see. I believe that all honourable senators support the objectives of this motion. In practical terms, there have been two difficulties. One is the problem of manning such a committee with such an ambitious and desirable menu. Also, there is the time left in this particular session to achieve some development of that particular menu.

However, Senator Watt has indicated to me and to other honourable senators that he feels it desirable even in that context that the committee be established and that it be given an opportunity to have a couple of meetings between now and the adjournment at the end of June. He has spoken to particular senators who would be prepared to serve on the committee to that extent, on both this side and the other side.

Hon. Martial Asselin: How many members would the committee consist of?

Senator Frith: I forget what the motion says as to how many members the committee would be composed of. You will remember in the case of the Committee on Youth, although it provided for more, Senator Petten and Senator Macdonald agreed on a reduced number of appointments, and perhaps that could apply in this case as well.

In that context, honourable senators, I propose that we adopt the motion for those purposes, and we can do that either immediately, depending on whether Senator Flynn and Senator Macdonald wish to do so, or, if not, we might try to do it this week which would give Senator Watt approximately a month to organize and, at least, set up some sort of a plan for the working of such a committee which might have to be re-established after the adjournment.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

CANADA-TAIWAN PARLIAMENTARY FRIENDSHIP COMMITTEE

MEETING IN TAIWAN—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Guy Charbonneau rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 21, 1984:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the meeting of the Canada-Taiwan Parliamentary Friendship Committee, held at Taiwan from 7th to 14th October, 1983.

He said: Honourable senators, last October, I had the pleasure of visiting Formosa with a delegation of representatives from both Houses. This journey gave me a completely different view of the situation than that projected by the media. Formosa is the miracle of the Orient. This country, with a population of only 18 million people, could very well become the Japan of tomorrow. While it is impossible to get a visa, either in Formosa or in Canada, the two-way trade between our two countries amounts to nearly $1 billion, which means 25,000 of the new jobs which we desperately need.

● (1600)

[English]

The Honourable Otto Jelinek, MP for Halton, moved a motion in the other place on September 21, 1983, which reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should facilitate the growth of commercial, cultural and other forms of contact between the people of Canada and Taiwan through (a) the establishment of a bilateral, non-diplomatic presence between Canada and Taiwan, including the issuance of visas directly in Taiwan and Canada thereby adopting the practice of Japan, the United States and most other western industrialized nations (b) the enhancement of trade links between Canada and Taiwan, including (i) the encouragement of export trade by Canada to Taiwan through the granting of credits and other forms of support to Canadian businessmen (ii) the establishment of direct air links between Canada and Taiwan by non-flag carrier airlines (iii) the adoption of any other practical mechanism to encourage industrial and other non-diplomatic contact between Taiwan and Canada.

Honourable senators, I approve of the motion put forward in the other place by the honourable member, and I am sure all honourable senators recognize the need for Canada to find new trading partners if we are to survive as a nation of traders.

[Senator Frith.]

Honourable senators, while I was in Taiwan, a keen interest was expressed by the government in the purchase of a Candu reactor from AECL. This industry, which cost Canadians billions of dollars to establish, is in danger of imminent collapse unless we can find countries willing to purchase this safe form of energy. Taiwan has expressed such a desire to pursue it further. One Candu sale is equal to 25,000 new jobs for Canadians, and with approximately one and a half million people out of work, I think we should, as aggressively as possible, pursue this sale.

Taiwan's economy is one of the fastest growing in the world today, and yet the two-way trade between our two countries is about U. S. $1 billion, and last year Taiwan had a $540 million trade surplus with Canada. We should be urging the Taiwanese to buy more Canadian lumber, coal and minerals. Also, the Taiwanese should be made aware of the fact that Canada has a very sophisticated high-tech industry, and we are always looking for new markets, particularly in the Pacific Rim countries. Let us remember: The per capita income in Taiwan is approximately U.S. $2,500 per year as opposed to U. S. $500 on the mainland.

[Translation]

While trade relations between Canada and Formosa are most encouraging, we have only to look at our southern neighbours to see that their own trade volume exceeds $15 billion U.S. The reason for this is very simple: The United States do not recognize Formosa diplomatically, but the Americans are aware that they cannot afford to close their doors to a country with such a tremendous economic growth. This is why Canada should try to strengthen its trade links with Formosa.

To do so, the visa system should be reviewed. At the present time, to obtain a visa for Canada, a businessman in Formosa must submit his application to the Canadian High Commissioner in Hong Kong; there can be a delay of up to two weeks before he gets it. In addition, a little over one year ago, representatives of the Formosan government who were supposed to lead purchasing missions in Canada were refused visas by our country.

In my humble opinion, this is certainly not the right way to do business. On the other hand, Canadian businessmen must apply for visas in the United States; this means a waste of money and time. As parliamentarians, we also represent the business world and we must see to it that things change in this regard; to do so, we have only to look at what is done in the United States.

[English]

The U.S. does not recognize Taiwan diplomatically, and yet American businessmen can obtain a visa in major U. S. cities such as New York, Boston, Chicago, Washington, Los Angeles and San Francisco, just to name a few. The Taiwanese can receive a visa in 24 hours from the U.S. office in Taiwan, called the American Institute in Taiwan. Canada and Italy now stand alone in the western world in having no presence at all in Taiwan. I am not suggesting that we should re-establish diplomatic ties, but that we should look at other forms of bilateral, non-diplomatic contact between our two countries.

One of the areas that we, as a Canada-Taiwan parliamentary friendship group, feel should be explored more fully is to find out if the chambers of commerce of our respective countries could fulfill the role of the AIT. The American Institute in Taiwan is a non-profit organization licensed in the District of Columbia and established for the purpose of carrying out U.S. transactions in Taiwan. I believe that the Chamber of Commerce, or some other such organization, could fill this role very well, and that we should be aggressively pursuing this course of action for the benefit of all Canadians.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, if Canada should agree to this, it would surely make it possible for private corporations to operate to full capacity and create tens of thousands of jobs in all parts of Canada, not to mention the injection of billions of new dollars into our economy. In conclusion, I urge the government very strongly to join other non-Communist industrialized nations in Taiwan and take advantage of the extraordinary trading possibilities there to the benefit of all Canadians.

On motion of Senator Leblanc, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO REVIEW CANADIAN HEALTH CARE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, pursuant to notice of May 24, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to review all aspects of, and make recommendations on, an overall Canadian health care policy;

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place; and

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, in speaking to this motion, of which I gave notice last week, I wish to say that as the Senate committee studied the Canada Health Act it found many facets of the health care program which were not covered under that act.

● (1610)

During those hearings we had an opportunity to hear from the Ministers of Health of all the provinces and of the Yukon. They explained that the Canada Health Act did not provide solutions to all their health care problems. The federal government of the day was concerned with user fees and extra billing, and did not have an opportunity to discuss all of the other facets of the health care program with the provincial Ministers of Health. Realizing also that health, social services and education are areas of provincial jurisdiction, it was difficult for the federal government to add new clauses to the bill taking into account the desirability of prior consultation and agreement.

It is for that reason I felt that a Senate committee, representing the regions, might hear from the provinces, the doctors and the consumers, to see if it could bring forward some recommendations for a comprehensive medicare, medical insurance plan in Canada. Such a committee could recommend to the federal government that its report be discussed at a federal-provincial conference, to see whether some agreement could be reached to provide Canadians with such a comprehensive health care system.

Honourable senators, that is the background to my motion. As I gave thought to the subject, I read the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada and I noticed that back in 1971 there appeared to be a definite weakness in the area of the preventive health care programs, particularly for the poor, partly because many poor people were suspicious of large-scale programs and partly because of the inadequacy of existing staff facilities.

There seems to be a relationship between poverty and many aspects of health and health care, including rehabilitation services, mental health, preventive health services, environmental health, mental health, and nutrition. There appears to be an effect on health because of marginal existence, which is the common experience of many Indians and Inuit. The infant mortality rate in 1968 was 21 per 1,000 live births for all Canadians, whereas it was 49 per 1,000 for Indians and 87 per 1,000 for Inuits.

According to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada, one of the main causes of poverty in the past was the crushing burden of medical expenses. This cause of poverty has been greatly reduced by the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act of 1956 and the Medical Care Act of 1966, which provides for the sharing of medical costs between federal and provincial governments.

This program has brought improved medical care to millions of Canadians who would otherwise have been unable to afford it, and it has done so with dignity to the users of the service. Canada has, in this program, the vehicle for further expansion to cover other health needs, such as dental care, optical care, rehabilitation, mental health, home nursing care, chronic hospital care, and pharmaceuticals. This is an opportunity to expand this very worthwhile program of the Medical Care Act of 1966, and the Hospital Insurance Act of 1956. It is an opportunity that we should not miss.

Many people on welfare in many of the provinces receive dental care or optical appliances, psychiatric care, and tuberculosis care. But the working poor, who are not on welfare, have to dig deep to find money for health services not yet included in any federal or provincial health care plan, particularly the cost of drugs. High drug costs represent a real barrier to meeting health needs.

The report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada in 1971 recommended that hospital and medical services be financed entirely out of general revenues; that the Medical Care Act or similar legislation be the vehicle for bringing additional forms of necessary health care, including dental services and prescription drugs, to all Canadians. That was 13 years ago.

In conclusion, in asking honourable senators to support this motion, I shall read an extract from page 5 of the poverty report. It is a quote from a great Canadian, none other than the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who said:

In order to focus programs on those who need them, we must define, with as much clarity as possible, the essential components of a minimum standard for satisfactory living—not a subsistence standard but one which allows for dignity and decency.

With those remarks, I ask honourable senators for their support.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we on this side of the house will support the motion, but it would be a tall order for us to give to the committee. No one should be under any illusion as to the task before it, particularly from the viewpoint of timing when we are approaching the end of the session and possibly the end of this Parliament. The committee will not have much time to do a worthwhile job before it may be faced with a new House of Commons, although the Senate would survive an election.

I wish to say also that our experience with Bill C-3 should not be forgotten. The problem of health care is not resolved merely by reciting general rules such as those found in the Canada Health Act. Principles of universality, and so on, will not be sufficient to solve all of the problems. The multiplicity of difficulties involved in providing an adequate health care system indicates that the provinces are better equipped to decide what should be done to satisfy the various requirements of people in their area. Let us take, for example, the health problems that exist in Prince Edward Island and compare them with those that exist in Newfoundland. I believe those may be the two extremes. Alternatively, one could consider the Northwest Territories, the Yukon or northern Quebec. When we hear of problems such as those in distant regions of Quebec, in places such as Gaspé, Dolbeau or Lac St-Jean, it seems easy to conclude that the provincial governments are really better equipped to deal with these problems, which are local in nature, and with the varying circumstances which I was mentioning before.

• (1620)

If the committee tries to look at a general policy only from the point of view of the federal government, such as was done with respect to Bill C-3, it will never be able to provide anything very useful. What I mean is that the provincial responsibility is not only a matter of constitutionality but a matter of practicability.

I know that under the chairmanship of Senator Bonnell, who has some experience as a doctor, who was a former provincial minister of health and who is a Prince Edward Islander, these aspects will not be forgotten.

With that warning and these reservations, we have no difficulty in accepting the adoption of this motion.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I would like to make a comment at this time. I am, of course, wholly in agreement with the motion. I think the committee can provide a very useful service by looking into the whole health care delivery service which is in existence at the present time. Hospital insurance and medicare have been in place for a number of years now. I feel the time has come not only to try to fill in the gaps, as it were, but to see if we are obtaining value for the money we are now spending.

I am particularly concerned with respect to the administration costs as they relate to hospital care. I sometimes feel that the patient is the last person to be considered whereas the bureaucracy, or whatever you want to call it, sets out the plans. It is the bureaucracy which builds these beautiful, big hospitals—apparently not enough—but are we receiving the service for our money in these hospitals? At one point in time I had in mind advocating the setting up of a royal commission to examine this matter; however, now I feel the committee could perform this service just as well.

In Nova Scotia we are funded through sales tax, and there are no premiums as far as we are concerned. The tendency nowadays seems to be to try to keep the patient in hospital for the shortest possible time and then out he goes. We need more hospital care, as well as home care, and I, for one, am not satisfied that we are receiving value for the huge sums of money we are spending on hospital care and medical care.

I think the committee would serve a useful purpose by looking into all aspects of our health delivery service.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES 1984-85

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which were referred the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 651.)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

TWENTIETH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's report approving the budget of the Special Senate Committee on Youth.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE IMPACT OF TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE ON CANADIAN SOCIETY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, June 5, 1984, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and consider the impact of technological change on the fabric of Canadian society;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination; and

That the Committee present its report no later than September 30, 1985.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, June 4, 1984, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there will be a reasonably steady flow of what can be described as mostly non-controversial—that does not mean totally without controversy so let us say “minimal controversy”—legislation during the next two weeks and possibly the last two weeks of June. For that reason I am proposing that we adjourn until eight o'clock next Monday. A good many of these bills, up to six or seven in number, if passed in the other place will be passed on Friday. On Monday evening we can receive them, give them first reading and in some cases, with leave, give the sponsors the opportunity to move second reading. This would merit our returning a day earlier than is the case with the normal adjournment. We can then continue with second readings and such interventions as are required the following day. The over-all plan is to try to deal with the business as it comes along, thereby keeping a little bit ahead of the normal pace so that we do not have a pile-up of legislation at the end of the month. We hope to have Royal Assent next Thursday and probably the following Thursday.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What is the date of the following Thursday?

Senator Frith: Let me check.

Senator Flynn: Don't tell me that you don't know.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): It is June 14.

Senator Frith: I will not tell you that I do not know, but I will tell you that I think it ought to appear that I do not know. It will be June 7 next week and June 14 the following week.

Senator Flynn: I see.

Senator Frith: And you just add seven from there on. That is the plan. I hope that we will not have to come back on the Monday in the following week, but I should advise honourable senators that unless things change in terms of the expected work, we will probably continue to sit on Monday evenings, on Tuesdays at 2 o'clock, Wednesdays at 2 o'clock, and Thursdays at 2 o'clock. I hope that we will not have to sit on Fridays. If we just increase the tempo a bit I think we can manage.

Senator Flynn: Can the deputy leader give us a list of the bills we can expect to come to us next Monday? I know it is not important for the government side to know because only the respective sponsors will speak on them, but we on this side would like to be able to prepare to discuss them as soon as possible. It is more important for us to know than for the government side.

Senator Frith: I think that is important for both sides. In any event, to speak in terms of the need for honourable senators to know, this afternoon at about 3.30 I will be hearing from Mr. Pinard's office. Usually I phone him on Thursday afternoons to determine what we can expect from the other place. I shall let the office of the Leader of the Opposition know and see that Mr. Lefebvre is kept totally up to date on the list so that he can communicate with Senator Flynn and other senators. I do not have a reliable list at the moment but I hope to have it at the close of business today.

Senator Flynn: I should like the deputy leader to put that list on the record here before we adjourn today, if at all possible. I have received some information from the other place but I would like to see whether my list is the same as that of the deputy leader.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will have to wait to hear what the house leader of the other place has to say, unless Senator Olson or Senator Austin can give us some indication of what legislation we can expect.

Senator Flynn: Why should Senator Olson or Senator Austin know?

Senator Frith: Because they are members of cabinet, and I am not.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That does not answer the question.

Senator Flynn: The deputy leader always makes the mistake in thinking that government and Parliament are one and the same. I can understand that Mr. Pinard would know something about the list, but to say that Senator Olson or Senator Austin know something about the legislation because they are members of cabinet is not justified at all. They don't know a thing, very likely.

[Senator Flynn.]

• (1410)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I suppose some of us do fall prey to making the same mistake over and over again, and that is a rule of human behaviour that I am sure the Leader of the Opposition has not been exempted from either.

Senator Flynn: I have had occasion to do that.

Senator Frith: I do not know how it was under a Conservative administration—

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: You will soon find out.

Senator Frith:—but if I understand correctly, and I think I do in spite of what Senator Flynn has said, committees of cabinet do deal with the planning of legislation. The members of that committee have more information about the details of proposed legislation than I do. I have to wait until I hear Mr. Pinard tell the House of Commons what is being proposed.

To get back to where we were—and I am sure we can have an interesting afternoon discussing my lack of understanding of the system—what it comes down to is that, as I have said, I will have that information later this afternoon. I cannot undertake to put that on the record, though the purpose for which the opposition wants to know is a reasonable one—that is, to have as much advance notice as possible about proposed legislation so that they can make arrangements to debate that proposed legislation. As soon as I have received that information, I will see that it is sent to the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: I do not want my comments to prevent Senator Austin from telling us what he knows about the situation. If he can add to the discussion, he is welcome to do so.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He does not answer any questions.

Senator Frith: I think Senator Flynn wants the last word on this subject.

Senator Flynn: Certainly not Senator Austin.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA—STATEMENT TO ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to address my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In a brief to the Energy and Natural Resources Committee last week the Economic Council of Canada said that scrapping key elements of the National Energy Program would create 100,000 jobs. Given the significance of the body making that recommendation, would the Leader of the Government, without waiting for the report of the committee, encourage his cabinet colleagues to take action similar to that recommended by the Economic Council of Canada? If the cabinet were to adopt that recommendation, it would create many jobs and lower the rate of inflation in the process.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question falls into the category—as is very often the case—of those where members of the opposition give only half of the background information.

The government in its wisdom—which it has displayed over and over again—would rather choose to look at the entire report and weigh the costs against the benefits that may be involved in that recommendation.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: You have been listening to the man from Chicago.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Do you agree or disagree with that?

Senator Olson: The government does not do that.

Senator Asselin: Why not?

Senator Olson: If it is wise, it takes into account recommendations made by all bodies, however eminent they may be, including the Economic Council of Canada. That means that everything involved is looked at, including the costs and benefits, before agreeing or disagreeing. It cannot be done on a simplified basis as recommended by Senator Asselin.

Senator Charbonneau: I have a supplementary question. Does the minister not agree that there has been a chorus of bodies, commissions, whatever, that have agreed with the Economic Council of Canada on this matter? What is the government waiting for? We are looking at 100,000 jobs. Is the government going to wait until next year, as usual?

Senator Olson: The government has had the National Energy Program under consideration for a long time and has made a number of amendments to it from time to time.

I do not want to repeat what I said a few minutes ago, but it is equally applicable to that kind of argument.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether or not he would agree that the national energy policy and Petro-Canada, in particular, deserve the credit for the latest oil find off the coast of Newfoundland?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am sure all of us are extremely happy to hear of that most recent oil find. We hope all subsequent testing which, no doubt, will be carried out will substantiate the projections which have been made.

I am afraid I cannot agree with Senator Godfrey that we should take unqualified credit for it.

Senator Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to point out to the Leader of the Government that had it not been for the national energy policy this find would have been made a long time ago.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is only an opinion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): With that type of information you could make a great deal of money on the market.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not think the honourable senator should have made that comment since it calls into question assertions he makes from time to time.

Senator Flynn: In any event, perhaps I could ask the Leader of the Government if he could give us some information with respect to the mega-projects he was discussing some two years ago. Can he name those projects which were abandoned? Are the ones which were abandoned coming back on stream? What is the situation? I remember the leader boasting about those mega-projects.

Senator Olson: I would be very happy to bring a list of those projects which were included in the list of major projects studied by the committee about which my honourable friend knows.

Senator Flynn: You have more responsibilities now!

Senator Olson: As Leader of the Government, I do not have direct responsibility for the department at the present time. However, I can tell the honourable senator that I am as interested now as I was then in these projects being carried out. The honourable senator would be surprised at the number of projects which have gone forward; granted, some of them were not on as large a scale as forecast at the time. As they were described, mega-projects—

Senator Flynn: By you!

Senator Olson: No, by the committee. A mega-project was described as any project in which the capital investment exceeded $100 million. I can tell this house that there have been a large number of projects which have proceeded, some of them not quite as large as indicated, that is, not up in the multi-billion dollar range. However, a large number of them have proceeded. I think it would be useful for honourable senators and the general public to know how many of these projects have gone forward.

Senator Asselin: It would be better if you were to bring a list of the projects which were scratched.

Senator Flynn: I will accept that reply as it was given in such general terms.

SENATE REFORM

REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question asked by Senator Asselin on May 24 as to whether it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation soon which could reflect the views of the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform.

The reply is that the government is committed to use the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform as a working document in its consultations with the provinces, as evidenced by the Prime Minister's response to that report on April 10.

To this end, the Minister of Justice was mandated by the Prime Minister to press ahead energetically with intergovernmental consultations, and has already had discussions based on the report of the joint committee with the governments of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Alberta and Quebec.

Consultations have not been completed as yet and, therefore, there are no current plans to introduce legislation on Senate reform.

CANADIAN SPORTS POOL CORPORATION

APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, yesterday I asked the Leader of the Government to produce a list of members of the Liberal Party who were appointed to jobs in the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation. Does the Leader of the Government have the list with him today?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no, I do not. That question is not on my list of questions to which I have delayed answers. I see very little relationship between the honourable senator's question and the reply I have given. However, that is the honourable senator's usual practice.

Senator Asselin: Would you produce the list next week?

Senator Olson: I believe we gave an undertaking that we would try to obtain such a list. However, that undertaking is not on the basis the honourable senator has put forward.

Senator Asselin: We will judge the list for ourselves.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE OFFSHORE APPLICATION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hastings, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, for the second reading of the Bill C-16, intituled: "An Act to apply the customs and excise jurisdiction of Canada to the continental shelf of Canada and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof".—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have some concerns and reservations about this bill that have not been addressed in the debate so far either in the other place or here, although I hasten to thank Senator Hastings and congratulate him on a very succinct presentation on behalf of the government with respect to the bill the other evening. I believe that my reservations and concerns can best be addressed when this bill goes, as I think it should and I trust it will, to committee.

The essence of this bill is to extend Canada's customs and excise legislation beyond the 12-mile limit to the outer edge of the continental shelf or to 200 miles offshore, whichever is farther. Let me say at once that we fully support that initiative on the part of the government. We think this is something that, in fact, is overdue and should be done in order to fully exercise Canadian sovereignty. It means that foreign goods used in the resource industry, not the fishing industry because, generally speaking, the fishing industry seems to be exempt from the provisions of this bill, beyond the 12-mile limit are now subject to the regular customs duties and excise taxes. It means that anti-dumping legislation and countervailing duties can be applied by Canada out to the 200-mile offshore limit.

The Minister of State for Finance, who introduced the bill in the other place, said that this will enable Canada to exercise economic sovereignty on the continental shelf, and to provide the business community with an environment in which it can compete on a fair and equitable basis. Our colleague, Senator Hastings, said much the same thing when he introduced the bill in this chamber on Tuesday evening.

I think it should be pointed out that Canadian suppliers and manufacturers have not been completely naked before their enemies out to this 200-mile limit even up until now. They have not been utterly without protection as some would pretend in advocating this bill. The Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration monitors very carefully the provision of supplies and services to the exploration companies. The exploration agreements that are signed by the companies and COGLA—Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration—provide for Canadian content rules that the companies undertake to abide by. COGLA keeps lists of available Canadian suppliers and contractors. If a Canadian source is available as an alternative to a foreign source, the exploration company is required by COGLA to use the Canadian source almost regardless of price. There is a certain premium, as I understand it, that the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration people place on contracts. Beyond that premium, of course, I suppose the company is not obliged to buy Canadian, but there is a great deal of room for a wide interpretation on the part of the people who run the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration Act and to implement the act and its regulations. The implementation of the customs and excise duties proposed in this bill would be a more objective regime for protecting Canadian manufacturers and suppliers. After all, the kind of advantage that is conferred upon domestic manufacturers and suppliers by a customs and excise regime is more visible, quantifiable and understandable by foreigners and Canadians alike.

One of the questions that I believe should be raised is: What role will now be played by the more subjective regime operated by the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration? In the absence of any statement to the contrary, I assume that these new customs and excise duties will be applied on top of the non-tariff barriers, if I may describe them as such, that are imposed by the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration.

This bill also brings with it a 20 per cent rate of duty on vessels and floating structures used for petroleum drilling beyond the 12-mile limit. It is on this aspect of the bill that I would like to focus for a moment or two. If this bill is passed, the exploration companies will have a choice between using foreign rigs and paying the 20 per cent duty or having them built and leasing them in Canada at a higher price. Either way, exploration costs are going to go up. My question is: By how much? Will increased exploration costs reduce the number of wells that are being drilled offshore, as some contend will be the case? I do not know, honourable senators, but I think we should find out.

The government says not to worry. After all, 80 per cent of the exploration costs are covered and will be covered by PIP grants. The government, through PIP grants will pay, one assumes, 80 per cent of the 20 per cent duty that it is imposing with the other hand. Indeed, Mr. MacLaren, the Minister of State for Finance, made the argument, as reported on page 3973 of the House of Commons Hansard, that any revenues the government realizes from the duties and taxes will be more than offset by the expenditures relating to increased PIP grants and corporate tax savings. In parenthesis I might say that the fact that the government is imposing, with one hand, a 20 per cent duty and, with the other hand, is paying 80 per cent of that 20 per cent duty in a PIP grant, may be a rather temporary comfort to the exploration companies. I say "temporary" because I do not think anybody expects that the PIP grants, in the form we have known them, are going to last very long. The government has an internal evaluation under way with a target date of 1986. If the government can hurry it up, it is going to do so because ministers know that the PIP grants are costing the treasury too much.

● (1430)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Is that your opinion?

Senator Murray: The ministers know, and certainly a man who disports himself from time to time as a fiscal conservative, as the Leader of the Government likes to do, at least when talking to the business community in Alberta, knows this. Ministers know that the PIP grants are costing too much. There is no incentive to frugal planning or even prudent planning. The ministers know perfectly well that they are going to get out of them one way or another. They are going to change the regime if they get the time and the chance.

Senator Olson: Who are "they?"

Senator Murray: The government of the day of which my honourable friend is a part. Arguably, my honourable friend's candidate for the leadership of the Liberal Party, Mr. Chrétien, might not recognize reality as quickly as some others might because he is determined not only to defend the mistakes of the past but to repeat them. The Leader of the Government must know that if Mr. John Turner, for example, has the time and the opportunity he is going to try to unscramble that omelet, and the prevailing wisdom, if you like, in the government in the little time that they have left to them is to try to change that regime.

Senator Olson: It looks like it is going to be a longer period.

Senator Murray: I suggest that the minister knows very well that PIP grants are costing the treasury too much and they do not provide any incentive for prudent or frugal planning on the part of industry and the ministers are going to change it. I suggest to the minister that there is an evaluation taking place within the government with a target date of 1986.

Senator Olson: What is the honourable senator's view? The honourable senator never tells us what he or his party thinks. Is that asking too much?

Senator Murray: We never would have gotten into PIP grants. The Conservative Party would have put a different kind of regime in place. PIP grants were not our solution; they were the minister's solution.

Senator Olson: So you would never have introduced such a program?

Senator Murray: We had another program with which the minister should be acquainted.

Senator Olson: I am acquainted with it.

Senator Murray: Unscrambling the omelet is the agreeable task which, in the few weeks he may be Prime Minister, Mr. John Turner will have to address himself to and, on a longer-term basis, that Brian Mulroney and a new Conservative government will have to address themselves to.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): And especially Senator Frith who has declared himself in favour of Mr. Turner.

Senator Murray: I was not aware that the deputy leader had declared himself in favour of Mr. Turner.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have not heard that we are going to give it back to the multinationals, as you say.

Senator Murray: The point I want to make is that for the time being the government is going to pay, in PIP grants, 80 per cent of the 20 per cent duty that they will levy with the other hand. That is a temporary comfort to the companies involved.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to call for order because it is very difficult to hear what is being said when someone is speaking and comments are being made on the other side. If senators were to stand up, one at a time, we would all be able to enjoy the interchange.

Senator Murray: I thank Senator Bell for her comment. For my part, I will certainly do my best to make sure I am both heard and understood.

The tariff is a longer-term measure while the PIP grants, clearly, are a short-term measure. If this 20 per cent duty is not going to raise significant revenue for the government, and Mr. MacLaren, who should know, said that it is not, the only argument for imposing it is the protection that it might offer and the business it might create for Canadian shipbuilders.

Senator Olson: Is that not important?

Senator Murray: When Senator Hastings introduced this bill, he said, and I quote:

With these measures in place, it is estimated that about $3 billion worth of installations and vessels required over the next 10 years for use in the offshore will be built in Canada without the need for additional government support.

The Minister of State for Finance made a similar statement in the other place when he introduced the bill. I would like to see some evidence, some documentation, to support that contention, because no such evidence or documentation has been offered by a government spokesman, either in the other place or here in the course of this debate. Even if this bill does have a stimulative effect on Canadian shipbuilding, it will be some considerable time before it is realized.

Mr. MacLaren described as "very generous" the grandfather clauses that have been inserted in the bill to exempt, for example, the vessels currently under lease in Canada, or which were under order prior to January 1983. In terms of the leases, this might mean five years, and after five years, as I read the legislation, it means that they could be Canadian-flagged. If the vessel has been here for only one year, then after that one year the vessel will be subject to the duty, but it might be some considerable time before any impact, if there is to be any impact from this bill, is realized.

In any case, I am informed that exploration companies will continue to use foreign rigs because it is cheaper to do so, notwithstanding the 20 per cent duty. I am also informed that because of the downturn in North Sea exploration there is a glut of these vessels and installations on the market now and that they are available at bargain prices, so that exploration companies will continue to import the rigs, notwithstanding the 20 per cent duty. I am further informed that no rigs will be built in Canada in the foreseeable future, and that this bill will not stimulate construction as it is claimed it will.

I have not had much time to look into these matters and I cannot vouch for these statements, although they have been made to me on what I regard as being reliable authority. What I say to the Senate is that we should find out whether this is the case. The shipbuilding industry has made representations to the government in favour of this bill. However, if the bill passes, will the next representation from the shipbuilding industry be to the effect that the 20 per cent duty is not high enough to stimulate the domestic industry, that we should restore it to 25 per cent, which is what it was within the 12-mile limit? If that does not work, then perhaps we should try 30 per cent, 35 per cent or even 40 per cent. I think most honourable senators will agree that there is no future for Canada, or for the Canadian shipbuilding industry for that matter, if we get into that kind of exercise. This seems to be a case where we are inventing piecemeal an industrial strategy willy-nilly. Instead, I believe we should ask what are Canada's realistic prospects of competing, in the way we are now trying to do, in the world's shipbuilding markets. We should ask whether more restructuring is needed in the industry, whether Canada should try further specialization in shipbuilding.

● (1440)

Therefore I would like the Senate to take a day or two in committee to put these and other questions about the bill to the responsible ministers and officials, and also to interested parties outside the government, who may have some of the answers. It would not hurt to take a couple of days in committee on these matters. I remind honourable senators that this bill went through second reading, Committee of the Whole and third reading in the other place in two hours one afternoon recently. I think it behooves us not to delay matters unduly, but to look a little closer at this legislation and to give sober second thought to some of its provisions and ramifications. I am not criticizing the members in the other place. Some eloquent speeches were made in the House of Commons by the minister, and, on behalf of the shipbuilding industry and the employees of that industry, by Mr. Howard Crosby, MP for Halifax West; by Mr. Don Blenkarn, MP and by Mr. Skelly MP of British Columbia, and I am sympathetic to their concerns. Some of them have argued that the duty should be imposed on fishing vessels measuring 30 metres or longer, which are now duty free.

Assuming that the bill goes to committee, people who are more sympathetic to tariffs and duties than I am would have an opportunity to state their case to apply the provisions of this bill to goods and equipment for the fishing resource industry.

Finally, I may say that Mr. MacLaren and our colleague, Senator Hastings, expressed some confidence that there are no substantive implications with respect to our obligations under the GATT, although Mr. MacLaren in his speech in the other place, pointed out that Canada did take the precaution of giving notification to the GATT of Bill C-16.

At the same time, I should point out that the British Minister of Trade, Paul Channon, has expressed the opinion that Bill C-16 probably—I put the word "probably" in quotation marks—does abrogate the GATT. I must say that he does not offer any evidence for that, and the quotation that I saw attributed to him in a publication seemed to be rather offhand and almost a curbstone legal opinion—one of those free legal opinions that is worth what one pays for it. In any case, he is a responsible minister in the United Kingdom and he has expressed his view that our bill would abrogate the GATT. All of us take the GATT seriously, and that is another matter that I believe we would be well advised to look at when the bill goes to committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable senator a question? I listened carefully to what he had to say, and I believe he mentioned that he was in favour of the principle of the bill. Therefore do I take it that we can complete second reading now and that, although the honourable senator wishes to look at some of the mechanics and details of the bill, he is in favour of the principle of the legislation? He has asked that the bill be referred to committee, and during my time here we have never refused such a request. Indeed, it would be a rare occasion when we did. The appropriate committee would be the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, since the essence of the bill is custom tariff and taxation rather than energy. If that is so, Senator Hastings could close the debate on second reading and we could proceed in that way.

Senator Murray: If by "principle of the bill", the Deputy Leader of the Government means to say the extension of Canada's customs and excise legislation out to the 200-mile limit, then yes indeed I am in favour of that, which I regard as being the essence of the bill. If we have the same understanding of what the principle is, yes.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform honourable senators that if Senator Hastings speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, Senator Murray has eloquently expressed some reservations and concerns he has with Bill C-16, reservations and concerns which in some respects are quite complex and, I agree, might better be examined and explained in committee. At the conclusion of my remarks, I shall therefore move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where it could receive the examination he requests.

The honourable senator alluded to two or three things to which I might respond. We agree that the legislation represents an extension of the application of excise tax from 12 miles to 200 miles, or the shelf, whichever is farther, and is an extension of Canadian economic sovereignty to that degree. In introducing the bill, I said it was designed to fill a vacuum in Canadian law to enable Canadian manufacturers to participate on an equitable basis in the economic activity that was taking place in that part of Canada. I submit that it is simply an extension of a commitment made by this government in 1980, in the National Energy Program, to the Canadianization of the industry. That is a sector that is sometimes overlooked.

Perhaps I could refer to it as the spirit of Canadianization. It is a fact that industry now thinks Canadian, and in all Canadian corporations there is now a Canadian benefits section which examines each and every project as to its Canadian content or Canadianization; and as Senator Murray has indicated, they work with the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration and the Canadian industrial benefits section of Industry, Trade and Commerce in order to find better ways and methods to enable the Canadian manufacturing sector to participate in the Canadian oil and gas industry.

As a result of that activity, and of PIP grants, there are now seven additional Canadian companies participating in the exploration off the east coast.

• (1450)

Canadians are participating along with the multinational corporations in the exploration off the northern frontier and the east coast. The Canadianization aspect of the national energy policy has been a total success, whether it be in terms of profit share, asset share, or upstream revenue, which is the most reliable.

Honourable senators, let me give you some figures on upstream revenue. In 1978 Canadians received $2 billion in revenue whereas foreign-owned companies received $7.7 billion. The share of ownership was 21 per cent Canadian and 79 per cent foreign. In 1982-83 the figures were $3.6 billion and 38 per cent Canadian and $5.9 billion and 62 per cent foreign. In addition, Canadian companies now have an opportunity to earn interest on the 38 per cent of Canadian earnings, an increase over 1978 by 17 per cent.

As Senator Murray alluded to this afternoon, PIP grants have made a great impact on the Canadianization of that industry. Senator Murray told me to be here today to face the music. I can only say that it is the same old Tory lyric and one which we have come to accept from the spokesman for the multinationals.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is an unsubstantiated slur.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): They seem to be in vogue today.

Senator Roblin: I did not like it.

Senator Hastings: Senator Murray asked what effect this would have on exploration costs. In considering the extent of such explorations, we must also consider the many uncontrollable costs that affect the cost of exploration. I am thinking of changing interest rates, the supply and demand of equipment and so on. In any event, Senator Murray is entitled to raise these questions.

Honourable senators, I would ask you to support second reading, and afterwards I shall move that the bill be referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES OF CANADA

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Aboriginal Peoples of Canada;

That the Committee be composed of eight Senators.

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee.

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.—(Honourable Senator Roblin P.C.)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I regret that I am unable to proceed with this debate this afternoon. I must tell the Senate that the mover of this motion has shared with me his concern that we proceed with it as fast as we can. I am in sympathy with that proposition, but I am not prepared to proceed with it today. However, I hope to do so in the near future.

Order stands.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

VETERANS AFFAIRS—MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL FROM PLACE TO PLACE IN CANADA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of May 24, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on 4th April, 1984, to examine the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985, be empowered to travel from place to place within Canada for the purpose of such examination;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than November 1, 1984.

He said: Honourable senators, concerns are being expressed widely across the country about the length of time it takes to process applications for veterans' pensions. While corrective action and corrective measures have been taken over the years by the Department of Veterans Affairs, there arises periodically obstacles which present the adjudication process being dealt with in as short a time as possible for the benefit of the veterans. At a time when the average age of the veteran gives reason for concern, it is necessary to ensure Canada's commitment and it is imperative that the process be reviewed immediately. I would like to go back to section 1.1 of the original act—I am not sure of the the year but it dates back to the 1940s—which reads:

The provisions of this Act shall be liberally construed and interpreted to the end that the recognized obligation of the people and Government of Canada to provide compensation to those members of the forces who have been disabled or have died as a result of military service, and to their dependants, may be fulfilled.

I point this out because as veterans grow older the pension process and pension legislation must be reviewed with a view to relaxing the restrictions in cases where evidence may not be readily available—and here I question the veterans' treatment by some medical examiners—to ensure that they give the benefit of the doubt to the veteran who applies for a pension indicating that he has a condition that is attributable to his war service. One of the objectives I would like the committee to have is to review the variations in the schedule of rates in disability pensions as against the rates of war veterans allowances and, particularly, to examine the alleged discriminatory aspects of proportionate pensions and allowances for surviving spouses as they apply under the Pension Act and under the War Veterans Allowances Act.

We must examine the effects of the amending legislation under Bill C-82 which provided that surviving spouses and dependent children of deceased pensioners assessed at less than 48 per cent disability be eligible to receive one-half of the current married rate of disability pension payable to the deceased pensioner at the time of death. The government is to be commended for bringing in Bill C-82 a few years ago. It allowed wives of pensioners who were receiving less than 48 per cent to get a portion of that pensioner's pension. As a result of inflation and the cost of living, that legislation should be reviewed to ensure that the single pensioner widows are getting just treatment.

With regard to the pension process I think it is time that we reviewed the McCracken report. I think it is time to review the report by Mr. McCracken to the Minister of Veterans Affairs relating to possible improvements and promotion of the major administrative and adjudicative procedures of the pension process.

● (1500)

Honourable senators, there are new groups of veterans' organizations being formed across the country at this late stage in their lives. The members of those new organizations are concerned that time and time again their pension applications are being turned down. They are writing to MPs and senators, which indicates that, despite the fact that many veterans' organizations are doing exceptional work to help them receive their benefits—such as the Royal Canadian Legion, the War Amputees of Canada, the Army, Navy and Air Force Association, the Dieppe Veteran and Prisoners of War Association, the National POW Organization, and the Suffering Veterans Association of Toronto—they need further assistance. Second World War veterans are now aged 65, on average; First World War veterans are now aged 87, on average, so something must be done immediately. We must examine the pension process so that they will receive the justice they deserve.

There are also concerns being expressed by those veterans who were exposed to nuclear radiation at Chalk River. The United States government has just approved $2.6 million for compensation to those American veterans who were exposed to nuclear radiation. A new organization in Canada has been established in an attempt to get compensation for those Canadian veterans who were exposed to nuclear radiation.

We should also assess the effects of the POW Compensation Act whereby veterans receive compensation based on the length of imprisonment and the country they were imprisoned in. In that regard, again, there are mounting grievances over the scale of eligibility for compensation and the term of imprisonment.

I think it is time that a parliamentary committee visited all the veterans' hospitals which were transferred over the years to the municipalities and provinces to see first-hand whether the veterans in those hospitals are receiving the treatment they deserve and which they previously received. The only one left now is St. Anne's Hospital in Montreal. I think we should also visit the veterans' homes to see if the treatment being received by the veterans in those homes is up to par.

Under the War Veterans Allowances Act, I think it is time we relaxed the restriction on veterans who have to live in foreign countries because of their health or because of voluntary choice. As those veterans reach the age of 60 and qualify for war veterans allowances, the restriction says that they must return to Canada and live in Canada for 365 days to qualify for an allowance. This means that such a veteran has to leave his wife and children in England or the United States or wherever, and come back to Canada and remain here for a year in order to qualify. He may only go back to his chosen home on visits, and that is costly. One veteran from Newfoundland who returned was wearing a pacemaker. I cannot understand the justification for continuing with this restriction.

We also have to examine the possibility of relaxing the rules and qualifications with respect to casual earnings. Under the War Veterans Allowances Act a veteran is now, thank God, receiving around $941.68 a month and, if single, is allowed to earn an extra $2,700 a year. Some veterans who receive war veterans allowances cannot work. If they receive workmen's compensation or social assistance, that amount is deducted from their war veterans allowance pensions. In order to help them to live a decent life, they should not be penalized for any workmen's compensation or Canada Pension Plan benefits they may receive.

There is a need now to re-examine the veterans' program which was put into effect a few years ago, because there are too many aging veterans who are being refused benefits under that program. The answer I received from a question I put on the order paper shows that 20 per cent of the applications were being turned down. It think that that deserves some re-examination.

New legislation was tabled in the House of Commons to expand the veterans' program by $100 million over the next few years, but I think it is necessary, because too many people are being turned down, to re-examine that program.

Another grievance relates to the fact that veterans who served during the war but remained in Canada as instructors, even though they wanted to go overseas, are not eligible for war veterans allowances, while almost on an annual basis justification is being found by the War Veterans Allowance Board to make eligible many veterans who served in dangerous waters around the country.

Those are just some of things we should look into. I can only repeat that this is necessary because of the age of those veterans and the mounting bitterness across the country. Many veterans feel they are not receiving their just due.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I undertook to attempt to obtain information on bills we might expect to receive next week. Senator Flynn asked that I put that information on the record, if possible. The information I have is that three bills—notice of which was given yesterday, or earlier this week in any event—will be introduced in the other place today, and according to plans they will be disposed of there tomorrow.

Those bills do not have numbers because they have not been introduced, but the first piece of legislation is a bill to be sponsored by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development entitled, "An Act to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act"; secondly, a bill to be sponsored by the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs entitled, "An Act to implement a treaty between Canada and the United States relating to the Skagit River and Ross Lake, and the Seven Mile Reservoir on the Pend d'Oreille River"; thirdly, a bill to be sponsored by the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs entitled, "An Act to establish the Asia-Pacific Foundation of Canada." I wish to remind all honourable senators that when the Senate rises this afternoon there will be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources in Room 250 of the East Block.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Has my honourable friend any information about other legislation which we might expect next week? Is there any further legislation that we might expect?

Senator Frith: The three bills I have described are the only ones I can give you information on now, and the present plan is to dispose of those bills in the other house tomorrow. As to what will happen the following week, I have nothing further to add at the moment.

• (1510)

Senator Roblin: I presume, without knowing, that these three bills are three in which there seems to be a reasonable unanimity of opinion in the other place. I would not be surprised if that were the case. Thus, we might indeed find that they will be passed in quick order. However, they really do not seem to me to be sufficient justification for meeting on Monday night just to give first reading to them. That is something which could well be done on Tuesday; and if this is all we have to do it will be pretty skimpy going.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the opposition now have notice with respect to these three bills. This gives them time to prepare their debate. We will try to obtain consent to introduce second reading, to have the government sponsors speak to these three bills. This will mean that by Tuesday we will be in a position to debate the bills on second reading. I believe we ought to keep to this schedule in order to remain ahead of the legislation coming from the other place. On this point there seems to be a difference of opinion.

There is no conclusive argument to convince anyone that it is absolutely necessary to meet on Monday evening. On balance, I have decided that with these three bills and other business which may come forward we will be kept busy Monday evening. We hope to receive a report from some committees next week about other bills presently at the committee stage. For those reasons, I feel we ought to proceed on this basis probably until June 30.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate the difficulties of my honourable friend in co-ordinating the business of the two houses; it is not an easy task. I appreciate his zeal in wishing to make some progress on bills, and I sympathize with him in this respect. I simply say that it is not probable that committees will be reporting Monday evening to this house. If they do, there is no possibility of debate on that occasion.

I say to him again that these three bills, important as they may be in certain respects, are not ones for which I feel any deviation from our usual procedure is required. I know that the house has passed the motion and that it is not likely to rescind it. In fact, under the rules I doubt that it could be rescinded. I simply say to my friend that it will be pretty thin gruel on Monday.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I ought to have added earlier that honourable senators will have noticed that the National Finance Committee has reported the main estimates.

I expect that on Monday we will probably receive a report on supplementary estimates (A) from the finance committee as well. I believe I mentioned earlier in the week that we hope to receive a report with respect to supply. My information is that we will also probably receive the appropriation legislation dealing with the main estimates. Of course, the main estimates may be rather distasteful gruel but they are certainly not thin.

Senator Roblin: They are rich enough as far as the taxpayers are concerned; I grant you that.

Senator Frith: Precisely.

CANADIAN VETERANS

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE WITHDRAWN

On the motion:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues still facing Canadian veterans;

That the Committee be composed of 5 Senators to be designated at a later date;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than November 1, 1984.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wish to withdraw motion No. 1 standing in my name.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 4, 1984 at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTING PRINCIPLES IN CANADA

The Committee chose to focus on Government Accounting Principles in Canada for a number of reasons:

1. The Auditor General, in giving an opinion on the financial statements of Canada for the year ending March 31, 1983, expressed four reservations, three of which were because, in his opinion, "the stated accounting policies are inappropriate for a fair presentation of the assets and liabilities and revenues and expenditures of the Government of Canada". The Committee wished to gain a better appreciation of the reasons for these reservations.
2. It is an essential feature of government accounting that the financial statements should compare actual results against the fiscal plan as expressed in the Estimates. In addition, the financial statements of Canada are prepared in strict conformity with the Appropriation Acts, which themselves are based on the votes contained in the Estimates. Thus, the Estimates in many respects dictate the accounting practices used in the financial statements. The Committee wished to determine whether certain questionable accounting practices result from the manner in which the law is drafted, or from the manner in which it is interpreted by those preparing Canada's financial statements.

3. The Government of Canada submits financial data in the Budget and in the Public Accounts in two forms using different accounting principles—the Public Accounts form of presentation and the Extended National Accounts form of presentation—and it is important to understand the principles underlying these two calculations of the government's deficit.
4. In a federal state, federal and provincial governments should follow similar accounting principles. This is not now occurring at least in part because there are no generally accepted accounting principles for governments in Canada. The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants (CICA) has created a Public Sector Accounting and Auditing Committee (PSAAC), whose objective is to make recommendations designed to improve and harmonize public sector financial reporting, accounting and auditing practices. The Committee wished to become familiar with their recommendations to date and their future plans.
5. Two federal government studies of accounting principles are being undertaken by the parties most directly concerned. The Office of the Comptroller General has undertaken a study to determine the purpose of the federal financial statements and to develop a set of objectives to improve them. The Office of the Auditor General of Canada has commenced a Federal Government Reporting Study to determine who uses federal government financial reports, what information they need, and why. The Committee wished to hear about their plans and how as a user of government financial statements it could contribute to their research.

Reservations of the Auditor General

The hearings of the Committee focused on the reservations to the opinion of the Auditor General on the financial statements of the Government of Canada for the year ended March 31, 1983. In summary, these reservations pertained to his opinion that:

1. The statements, because of the exclusion of revenue and payments from oil export charges, failed to comply with the stated accounting policy that revenue shall consist of all tax and non-tax receipts, and expenditures shall consist of all charges to budgetary appropriations, which affect the deficit or surplus of the government.
2. The statements do not provide a comprehensive and complete summary of the government's assets, liabilities, revenues and expenditures because significant departmental activities are reported in separate financial statements of, for example, the Unemployment Insurance Account and the Canada Pension Plan Account, and because the assets, liabilities, revenues and expenditures of Crown corporations are not consolidated with those reported.

3. Assets are reported at amounts in excess of their value because international development assistance loans and subscriptions are recorded at the full amounts advanced despite their concessionary terms.
4. There are unrecorded liabilities because the statements do not include amounts payable under statutory authorities, certain employee benefits are not accrued and potential obligations under guarantees are not recorded.

Conflict Between the Law and Economic Substance

Witnesses from the Office of the Comptroller General stressed the importance of the federal government accounting to Parliament in strict conformity with the law. The Auditor General of Canada, while acknowledging that the federal government selects those accounting policies that comply with authorities, observed that this results in financial statements that present a confusing and incomplete picture of the government's financial position and results of operations.

The Committee is concerned that strict adherence with legal authorities has resulted in the use of accounting procedures that convey inadequate or even misleading financial information. The Committee considers that the financial statements should be designed to provide the maximum amount of information on the economic effects of government activities. The Committee believes that the financial statements should account for government activities in the light of the policies of the government at the time they are prepared. The law should be interpreted in accordance with these policies, or if necessary changed to permit fair reporting of the true state of the government's financial affairs.

The Financial Administration Act now provides general authority for the appropriate ministers to decide on the form and content of the financial statements included in the Public Accounts. If this is not sufficient to enable financial statements to be prepared which report the economic substance of the government's activities, the Committee believes amendments to the authorizing legislation should be proposed. The Committee also believes that future legislation should not contain accounting provisions, which if strictly construed could result in misleading financial statements.

Supplementary Financial Statements

Reporting on individual appropriations, funds or corporations, as is now being done is accordance with the law, will not of itself communicate fairly the financial position or the financial results of the government. Most users lack the time and skills needed to extract and compile this information from the detailed statements, schedules and notes contained in the Public Accounts, and often all the information is not available. The Committee noted that the Governments of Alberta and British Columbia have commenced the practice of issuing supplementary financial statements aggregating specified purpose accounts and Crown corporation statements with those of their general revenue funds. The Committee recommends that the federal government also adopt the practice of providing supplementary statements.

The Committee recognizes that in preparing such a statement the government would need to resolve a number of accounting issues and uncertainties. Accordingly, these statements should be issued for information purposes only until these issues are discussed with other governments and standards are agreed to.

Generally Accepted Accounting Principles for Governments

The Committee considers that the government's first priority should be to restore public confidence in the financial information it reports by taking such actions as are necessary to enable the Auditor General to remove the present reservations to his opinion on the financial statements of Canada. Fair reporting of its financial condition and results should be its primary objective, but where options are available consistency with other Canadian governments is obviously desirable.

The Committee believes that it is important for all Canadian governments to utilize similar accounting practice if comparisons are to be made among them and if the financial affairs of all Canadian governments are to be compiled in a consistent fashion so that their total impact on the economy can be properly measured.

Generally accepted accounting principles for governments in Canada should be developed and the Committee encourages the CICA to expedite its efforts to formulate and recommend such principles to governments. The Canadian Government should continue to participate actively in the CICA's endeavours, provide the leadership expected of the federal government, and seek to achieve federal/provincial agreement on standards for government financial reporting. The Committee believes the government should consider the CICA's recommendations as soon as they are agreed to, and the Auditor General should draw attention in his report to any instances where the CICA's recommendations are not followed.

Other Accounting Issues

During the Committee's hearings a number of specific accounting practices were raised, particularly those forming the basis for the reservations to the Auditor General's opinion on the financial statements for the year ended March 31, 1983. Since the process of establishing and reaching agreement on generally accepted accounting practices may take time, the Committee urges the Offices of the Comptroller General and the Auditor General to resolve these issues expeditiously so that the Auditor General's reservations will no longer be required and the credibility of Canada's financial statements will be enhanced. Although the Committee's hearings were not extensive enough to permit it to take a firm position on these issues, the following views of the Committee are set forth as guidance to the Comptroller General and the Auditor General in studying these issues.

1. Accounting for Revenues and Expenditures.

The notes to the financial statements identify two basic concepts underlying the government's accounting system: one requiring that all duties and revenues received "shall form part of One Consolidated Revenue Fund", and the second that "the balance of the Fund shall be appropriated by the Parliament of Canada". Both of these are designed to enhance parliamentary control. The Committee endorses these basic concepts, and believes that all revenues emanating from parliamentary authority should be accounted for as revenues of Canada, and all expenditures authorized under appropriations granted by Parliament should be accounted for as expenditures. The present accounting for oil export charges illustrates a practice that is contrary to these basic concepts, and in the Committee's opinion should be changed.

2. Fragmented Reporting of Government Activities.

The Committee has already expressed its views in favour of supplementary financial reporting on all government activities. This will partly respond to the Auditor General's concern.

The Committee considered more specifically the present accounting treatment of specified purpose accounts, particularly the Unemployment Insurance Account and the Canada Pension Plan Account. The revenues and expenditures credited or charged to these accounts are not included with the revenues and expenditures of Canada, and any deficiency of revenue is shown as an asset recoverable by Canada and any excess of revenue is shown as a liability payable by Canada. The justification for this treatment appears to be that these funds are administered in trust for third parties and current legislation limits the liability of the Government of Canada.

Under the government's accounting policies, unemployment insurance contributions received from employers and employees, benefits paid and administrative expenditures are recorded through the Unemployment Insurance Account. Legislation permits the government to advance funds to the Account to cover any deficiency until sufficient revenues are received from contributors or Parliament authorizes additional budgetary appropriations. As at March 31, 1983, the net deficit of $3.6 billion was shown as a negative liability, or asset, even though these statements were dated almost six months later and no action had been taken to increase contributions.

The situation in respect of the Canada Pension Plan Account is somewhat different in that contributions still exceed payments out of the Account. The Chief Actuary of the Government of Canada, however, has estimated that $147.9 billion would be required to pay all future benefits as at December 31, 1982. This liability has not been recorded in the accounts of Canada because, although benefits are defined, the government's legal obligation is limited to the balance in the Account.

These examples illustrate the effect of reporting in strict compliance with the law. Both the Unemployment Insurance Account and the Canada Pension Plan Account were established under laws passed by the Parliament of Canada, and Parliament can be expected to take whatever actions are necessary to ensure that beneficiaries receive their entitlements under the law. Accordingly, the Committee believes that the government should reconsider its present accounting practices.

The other reason why Canada's financial statements are not complete concerns the accounting for Canada's investment in Crown corporations. Their transactions are included in the revenues and expenditures of Canada only to the extent that Parliament appropriates funds for them on a budgetary basis, or they pay dividends or interest into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Canada's investment is recorded as an asset and the Financial Administration Act permits the responsible ministers to establish a provision or allowance where they believe Canada's investment in these corporations is overstated in relation to their underlying values. Although together these provisions may result in fair reporting, the Committee believes that the statements, would be more informative and complete if Crown corporations were consolidated or their changing values were picked up through the equity method of accounting.

3. Assets Reported at Amounts in Excess of their Value.

The Committee heard views on both sides of the question of whether international development assistance loans and subscriptions are fairly recorded when they are shown at full value. However, it concluded that modifying the present practice and valuing these assets on a present value basis when they are advanced at concessionary interest rates, would be inconsistent with the manner in which other assets and liabilities are valued. Accordingly the Committee considers that this practice should not be introduced until a review has been completed of all other assets and liabilities for which the same practice might be appropriate and a generally applicable approach agreed upon.

4. Unrecorded Liabilities.

The Committee noted that the Government of Canada reports most of its liabilities on its financial statements. However, there are some noticeable omissions such as some employee benefits and guarantees of Crown corporation debts. It appears that the reason for not accruing certain employee benefits or obligations under guarantees is that Parliament has not provided the necessary authority to discharge them and there is uncertainty as to whether it will do so. This again illustrates how too strict an interpretation of the law can lead to misleading information. The law does not prevent such liabilities being recorded. The Committee believes that Parliament will honour commitments to its employees or to others under guarantees, and the legal uncertainty can be explained in a note to the statements.

5. Accounting for Capital Expenditures.

Several witnesses drew the Committee's attention to the fact that the main difference between the government's accounting practices and those of profit-oriented enterprises lies in the different treatment of capital expenditures. In government, these are written off as expenditures when funds are disbursed, since that is the time when suppliers derive economic benefit whereas profit-oriented enterprises record them as assets and amortize their cost over the period of their useful lives so as to measure the full costs of services rendered. The Committee noted that similar practices to those of profit-oriented enterprises are used in statements prepared on a National Accounts basis. The Committee appreciates the complexity of this issue, and therefore suggests that the question ought to be further reviewed by the Offices of the Comptroller General and Auditor General as part of the studies they are conducting.

PART I OF THE ESTIMATES: THE EXPENDITURE PLAN

The President of the Treasury Board reported that the 1984-85 Government Expenditure Plan calls for total outlays of $98.2 billion. These Main Estimates seek authority for budgetary expenditures of $96.5 billion and for $1.2 billion in loans, investments and advances. The overall expenditures also include $3.1 billion in envelope reserves and a special reserve of $800 million to cover adjustments to statutory programs.

This forecast of total outlays of $98.2 billion is an increase of 8.3% over the revised forecast for 1983-84 and is the lowest rate of growth of total outlays in six years.

The Main Estimates of $96.5 billion is 10.4% higher than the 1983-84 Main Estimates and represents a substantial decrease from last year's increase of 17.9% over 1982-83 Main Estimates.

The President of the Treasury Board was asked about the mechanisms to ensure that departments and agencies were spending their funds according to their stated policies. Concern about the funding of a film by the National Film Board about Billy Bishop raised questions whether the NFB was following its declared policy "to initiate and provide for the production and distribution of films in the national interest, and in particular... films designed to interpret Canada to Canadians and other nations". The Committee members were concerned that public funds had been used to produce a film which many groups and individuals felt contained inaccuracies which were damaging to Canada and to the memory of Billy Bishop. Committee members suggested that NFB officials should be invited to appear before an appropriate Senate Committee to discuss its mandate and activities.

The Canada Post Corporation is seeking $170 million for "infrastructure costs related to cultural mailings". This item had previously appeared in the 1983-84 Supplementary Estimates "C". Treasury Board officials explained that the $170 million is compensation to Canada Post for building additional plants and facilities to handle the half billion pieces of second class mail under the cultural mailings. This amount will be paid annually until 1986-87 when it declines to $100 million and it becomes zero in 1987-88, by which date the cost of the additional equipment would be amortized.

Respectfully submitted.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, June 5, 1984, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the plan I outlined last week was to sit Monday evening at 8 o'clock and each ensuing afternoon, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, at 2 o'clock. However, there are many committee meetings tomorrow, some of them dealing with legislation. There will likely be a vote in the other place on the appropriation bill covering on the main estimates and, I expect, on supplementary estimates (A), which were tabled this evening by the honourable Senator Doody, at a quarter to six tomorrow. If the appropriation bill is passed in the other place, we could deal with the first speech on second reading tomorrow evening and could thus have a head start on the major pieces of legislation. That is why I am proposing that we sit at 8 o'clock tomorrow evening rather than at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

IMMIGRATION

MARRIAGES OF CONVENIENCE—OFFICIAL DISCRETION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Stollery on May 8, 1984, concerning guidelines and rules given to immigration officers in cases involving marriages of convenience. Since it is a rather lengthy reply, I ask that it be taken as though it had been read.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Amendments to section 4 of the Immigration Regulations, 1978 which came into effect on April 1, 1984 preclude a Canadian citizen and a permanent resident from sponsoring the application of their spouse for landing in Canada where the spouse entered into marriage primarily for the purpose of circumventing immigration law in order to gain admission to Canada as a member of the family class and not with the intention of residing permanently with the other spouse.

A measure of subjectivity is required in the application of the immigration selection requirements as they apply to all classes of immigrants, not only to members of the family class. Guidelines currently in effect as a result of these regulatory amendments require immigration officers to outline in writing the detailed facts which led the officer to believe that a marriage is one of convenience. These facts in writing form part of the Record which goes before the Immigration Appeal Board when a Canadian citizen, who has sponsored an application for landing that is refused, exercises his/her right under subsection 79(2) of the Immigration Act to appeal the immigration officer's refusal to approve the application to the Immigration Appeal Board.

CANADIAN SPORTS POOL CORPORATION

APPOINTMENTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Asselin on May 30, 1984, concerning appointments made to the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation. Because the answer is brief I may as well read it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): So long as it is adequate.

Senator Olson: Yes, it is adequate but it does not take many words to attain that adequacy.

Senator Flynn: That is surprising.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is not government policy to provide lists of employees of crown corporations, whether the corporation involved is Air Canada, Canada Post or the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation.

As far as the distributors are concerned, none have been appointed as yet. The Canadian Sports Pool Corporation is still considering the 1,200 applications that were made in response to the advertisement of February 20, 1984, which appeared in the Canadian newspapers.

SALE OF TICKETS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Flynn on May 30, 1984, concerning the total ticket sales of the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation through May 30, 1984. Although the answer is relatively brief, it is, nevertheless, adequate.

I am informed that no figures are available on a weekly basis for ticket sales of the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation. However, these figures will be compiled on a monthly basis and I will be pleased to provide them to Senator Flynn as soon as the first month's sales figures are available.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay moved the second reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on a matter of considerable importance and concern to the mining industry and to the people of the Yukon Territory.

Since the days of the Klondike Gold Rush at the turn of the century, mining has played a significant and central role in the Yukon's development.

Its communities, its roads and highways, and, to a certain extent, the character of its people have been shaped by the search for and exploitation of the rich minerals that lie beneath the surface.

In recent years, Yukon mining has accounted for approximately three per cent of Canada's total mineral production. It provides about ten per cent of the Yukon's employment and is the single most important non-government contributor to the Territory's gross domestic product.

Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, the Yukon's industries have gone through a difficult period in the early part of the 1980s. The Cyprus Anvil Mine at Faro, by far the largest mining operation in the Territory, was forced to suspend operations temporarily in 1982 due to the world recession and low prices for lead and zinc, its principal products.

Nevertheless, honourable senators, the present government believes that the long-term prospects for northern mining are good and it has undertaken a number of steps both to strengthen the current situation and to encourage accelerated exploration and development in the decades ahead.

Through the persistent efforts of the federal government, working with the Cyprus Anvil Mining Corporation and the United Mine Workers, we have been able to keep that mine operating during these present adverse economic conditions. We are optimistic that Cyprus Anvil will be able to return to production later this year or early in 1985.

In another recent move, the government has acted to provide new directives to the Yukon Territory Water Board which provide an interim compromise in the matter of placer mining in Yukon streams and rivers.

Placer mining has had a significant resurgence over the last few years with the buoyant prices in effect for precious metals. However, potential conflict between miners and those responsible for environmental protection threatened the stability of this industry.

The government's directive has had the effect of stabilizing this situation pending the results of research efforts to develop new technology which will minimize the adverse effect of placer mining on water quality.

On a broader scale, the government has been working closely for some time now with the territorial governments and the mining industry to develop a comprehensive northern mineral policy. They will shortly start releasing mineral policy issue papers dealing with the major concerns relating to long-term viability of northern mines and their impact on northern economic development.

So the government is working very hard indeed to stabilize and promote the development of this industry, which is so vital to the northern territories and to all Canadians. There are in the North reserves of lead, zinc, iron ore, coal and tungsten, which give promise of expanded opportunities in the decades to come. So it is important that we in government do everything possible to promote and encourage the orderly development of these resources.

• (2020)

Honourable senators, this brings me to the legislation we have before us for consideration tonight—Bill C-44 which deals with important amendments to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. Although these amendments involve altering only one section of the existing act, they have great significance for the stability and development of the mining industry in Yukon. For this reason, I hope honourable senators will see fit to give them speedy consideration and early passage. The Yukon Quartz Mining Act is one of a number of pieces of legislation governing the administration of mineral exploration and development in Yukon. It delineates the law over prospecting and claim staking in Yukon for a wide range of minerals.

This is an old act, and many of its provisions are in need of review and revision. Section 12, with which we are dealing today, places severe limitations on the right to stake claims. It restricts an individual to staking only eight mineral claims within a 16.09 kilometre radius during any twelve-month period. Many years ago, most prospecting and mining operations were basically small-scale, and such restriction was felt both necessary and desirable. However, modern exploration techniques have evolved beyond the search for outcrops of minerals and the staking of that surface showing. Today, chemical and physical measurements are made to find broad areas in which follow-up work may identify smaller targets hidden in the subsurface for detailed exploration. This process can be costly and companies and individuals who have identified the broad surface areas wish to secure rights to those areas pending the definition of the small subsurface target areas. For this reason the eight-claim limit is no longer appropriate.

Through the years, the practice has developed whereby a company will hire a number of stakers, each of whom will stake eight claims, will record these under his or her own name and will later transfer the claims to the company. Thus, a company is able to acquire the large blocks of ground necessary to justify the cost of modern exploration. What concerns the government and those engaged in northern mineral development is that a court test could well rule that this prevalent practice contravenes section 12 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. Such a ruling would deal a serious blow to the future of mineral exploration in Yukon. It could also throw into question the validity of all claims staked in this manner over the years.

The amendments before us today will remove the limit placed on the number of mineral claims allowed to be staked by an individual; remove provisions regarding the staking of mineral claims by attorney and validate existing claims at least in regard to the provisions of section 12. If adopted, these amendments would bring the law concerning claims staking in Yukon in line with other jurisdictions in Canada. For example, the Canada mining regulations in the Northwest Territories were amended nine years ago to remove a similar restriction.

Honourable senators, the adoption of this bill will lay to rest a potentially serious problem for mining exploration in Yukon and will provide the industry with clear rules geared to the realities of the 1980s.

The bill before us has the support of the Yukon government and its citizens, of the mining industry and of the federal government. It received the unanimous approval of all parties in the House of Commons last week.

Honourable senators, I believe this bill merits the support of all of us in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY TREATY IMPLEMENTATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. D. G. Steuart moved the second reading of Bill C-41, to implement a treaty between Canada and the United States relating to the Skagit River and Ross Lake, and the Seven Mile Reservoir on the Pend d'Oreille River.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-41 will provide essential federal support for the Skagit settlement. The settlement will resolve, to the satisfaction of all parties, a long-standing irritant in Canada-United States relations centred on the threatened flooding of the Skagit River Valley in British Columbia. The settlement formula, of which the treaty is a necessary element, was developed during negotiations involving the governments of Canada, the United States, British Columbia and the city of Seattle. When ratified and implemented by all parties, the settlement will remove the threat of flooding, thus leaving the Skagit River Valley in its present natural state.

The Skagit River Valley treaty implementation bill, when adopted by Parliament, will accomplish three things. First, it will provide a solid basis for federal support of the overall Skagit settlement. Second, the bill will provide authorization for British Columbia to export electrical power to the city of Seattle for eight years—a basic provision of the settlement. Third, the bill will provide a federal guarantee of provincial financial obligations in the unlikely event that British Columbia should terminate or be found in material breach of its obligations to export electrical power to the United States.

The proposed settlement is contained in three documents. The basic document is a detailed agreement between British Columbia and Seattle, those parties most directly involved with the issue. This document was signed in Vancouver on March 30, 1984. The agreement is supported by the Canada-United States Skagit River Valley Treaty which resolves those elements of the settlement which British Columbia and Seattle lack jurisdiction to deal with themselves.

The Skagit treaty was signed by the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of the Government of Canada when Mr. MacEachen met with United States Secretary of State Shultz in Washington, D.C., on April 2, 1984.

• (2030)

The third document is the Canada-British Columbia agreement which supplements the treaty and clarifies the roles of the federal and provincial governments. I might also mention that this agreement would enable the federal government to recover from the province any moneys paid out under the terms of the federal guarantee.

One of the essential provisions in the British Columbia-Seattle agreement is the obligation on the part of the province to supply electrical power to Seattle for an 80-year period from 1986 to the year 2066. Currently, the National Energy Board Act restricts the authority of the Governor in Council to approve export of electricity for a period not exceeding 25 years. In order to overcome this restriction and permit British Columbia to meet its obligations, the Government of Canada undertook, in the Skagit River Valley Treaty, to seek the authorization of Parliament through this act to approve in this specific case the export of electrical power by British Columbia for the said period of 80 years.

The other essential provision of the British Columbia-Seattle agreement, supported by the treaty and addressed by this act, is the undertaking of the federal government, matched by a similar undertaking by the United States government in respect of Seattle's obligation, that is, to guarantee potential financial obligations on the part of British Columbia under its agreement with Seattle.

The Canada-British Columbia agreement, which is to be signed very soon, will ensure that the federal treasury is reimbursed fully in the highly unlikely event that funds are paid out on British Columbia's behalf.

Honourable senators, let me very briefly outline the background of the issue which has made this act necessary. In 1942, the City of Seattle obtained an order of approval from the International Joint Commission to raise the Ross Dam, and thus flood the Skagit River Valley. Opposition to this proposal grew in Canada, gaining considerable momentum in the 1960s. In the 1970s, active opposition to the order proved unable to reverse Seattle's authority to raise the Ross Dam and flood this valley. However, in 1982, the International Joint Commission suspended its 1942 order and established a joint consultative group on the Skagit River Valley to oversee the development of a satisfactory agreement between British Columbia and the City of Seattle. This group was co-chaired by Commissioners Richmond Olson from Canada and Keith Bulen from the United States of the International Joint Commission and included representatives of the Governments of Canada, the United States, British Columbia and the City of Seattle.

In December 1983, the group formally reached consensus on a settlement package proposal consisting of the previously mentioned British Columbia-Seattle agreement, the Skagit River Valley Treaty and the Canada-British Columbia agreement. The basic provisions of the settlement, which all the documents support in their individual ways, are that Seattle agrees not to raise the Ross Dam and flood the Skagit River Valley in return for a commitment from British Columbia to supply the city with the equivalent electric power it would have obtained had it been allowed to raise the dam. British Columbia will be paid, over a period of 35 years, the amount equivalent to the cost of building the dam plus an annual fee in lieu of maintenance costs. As the estimated life of the dam would have been 80 years, the agreement has been set to run for this length of time.

[Senator Steuart.]

The settlement is a very sensible solution to a long-standing and complex problem, one which serves to respond to the interests of all the parties concerned. It is further testimony to the value of the International Joint Commission, whose dedication and skill has once again succeeded in resolving a long-standing and difficult dispute with our American friends. The approval of the Skagit River Valley Treaty Implementation Act is necessary if Canada is to fulfill its commitment to ensure the success of the settlement. It is part of an over-all settlement formally developed in the closest co-operation with British Columbia. Therefore, by adopting this Bill C-41, Parliament will not only authorize the export of electrical power and provide a recoverable financial guarantee, but it will also ensure that important provincial expectations are met by positive, supportive federal action.

Honourable senators, this is a sound bill reflecting a sensible solution to a complex problem, and one which merits our fullest support.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

ASIA-PACIFIC FOUNDATION OF CANADA BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. D. G. Steuart moved the second reading of Bill C-42, to establish the Asia-Pacific Foundation of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I propose to this chamber the establishment of the Asia-Pacific Foundation of Canada, which will have as its objective the development of closer ties between the peoples and the institutions of Canada and the peoples and the institutions of the Asia-Pacific region.

Canada's links with this region, which extend from the Pacific Rim to South Asia and includes more than one-half of the world's population, have existed since the creation of Canada as a nation. However, it is only in recent years that a greater awareness has permeated the Canadian consciousness of the extraordinary importance to our future of the Asia-Pacific region. While Canada today is increasingly looking west across the Pacific, that does not mean that Canadians are just discovering the region. Our connections with the region are as steeped in history as are the very beginnings of our country.

Canada opened its first commercial office in the Asia-Pacific region in Sydney, Australia, in 1894. Melbourne, Yokohama, Shanghai and Calcutta followed over the next few years. In 1929, one of Canada's first diplomatic posts abroad was its legation in Tokyo. Today Canada maintains 17 diplomatic and consular posts to serve the rapidly expanding interests in that region.

The maintenance of peace and stability in the region has been a major preoccupation of Canadians for many years, beginning in the 1940s and 1950s when Canadian troops participated in the defence of Hong Kong, and later in the U.N. action in Korea. In another part of Asia, Canada served for many years on the Indochina Control Commission in Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos. Canada's interest in stability and security in Asia remains as strong today as it was then, and we have joined with many other nations in the region in condemning aggression in Afghanistan and Cambodia.

The economic and development needs of Asia have historically attracted the attention of Canadians and the Canadian government. The idealism which motivated Canadians to travel to Asia as missionaries, doctors and teachers was a genuine manifestation of the recognition of our important human ties with Asia.

In more recent years, individuals have contributed directly through their involvement with the activities of the Canadian International Development Agency, CUSO, the International Development Research Centre and other organizations. Canada was a founding member of the Colombo Plan and through this and other agencies, such as the Asian Development Bank, has formulated very extensive programs of bilateral and multilateral development assistance to that region.

Despite all those historic linkages, we, as a nation, have tended not to demonstrate a sufficient consciousness of our relationship with the region and our capacity to benefit from its immense potential. It was for that reason that over ten years ago the review of the Canadian foreign policy priorities highlighted the Asia-Pacific region as an area of challenge and opportunity. During the past decade, two-way trade with the region has multiplied six times. Canadian exports have increased faster to this region than to any other area of the globe. In 1982, two-way trade with the countries of the Asia-Pacific region surpassed our transatlantic trade for the first time.

That our relationship with the region has been steadily increasing over the past decade is also evident when one considers that in 1983, for example, 33,000 students from the region were studying in Canada; that immigration to Canada from the region was approximately 78,000 or 45 per cent of the total immigration to Canada; and that in fiscal year 1982-83, Canadian bilateral aid to the region was $305 million.

It is in recognition of these salient realities that the government saw the need to enhance this relationship and to make Canadians more aware of both our country's Pacific dimension and the opportunities for economic co-operation which exist. Thus, in 1983, a founding committee of the Asia-Pacific Foundation was created under the chairmanship of Mr. John Bruk, a leading British Columbia businessman. The committee was asked to make recommendations to the government by July, 1984 on the possible structure, objectives and activities for an Asia-Pacific Foundation. In fact, the committee produced its recommendations well in advance of that date. In reaching their conclusions, Mr. Bruk and his Founding Committee, travelled widely within Canada and held discussions with a broad cross-section of individuals, including representatives of provincial governments, businessmen, academics, and others with a strong interest in the Asia-Pacific region. The response to the Founding Committee's research was extremely encouraging, and in the Speech from the Throne in December 1983, it was announced that the government intended to facilitate the creation of the Asia-Pacific Foundation.

● (2040)

The aims of the Asia-Pacific Foundation reflect the outcome of the Founding Committee's extensive research. These objectives are: (1) to heighten Canadian awareness that Canada is a Pacific nation as well as an Atlantic nation; (2) to raise Canada's profile in the Asia and the Pacific region; (3) to increase Canadian participation in the region's economic prosperity; (4) to focus on policy choices facing decision-makers in the private and public sectors and to generate public support for new policy initiatives; (5) to assist business to be better prepared and more informed about Asia-Pacific affairs; and (6) to educate and train Canadian young people so that they will have the knowledge and skills to support Canada's future role in the Asia-Pacific area.

The objectives and organization of the proposed foundation are to some extent a new venture in Canadian legislative experience. The structure provides for the federal government to appoint the chairman and nine other members of the board of directors following consultation with members of the Founding Committee. The other 20 directors would be appointed by the board of directors itself, and would include representatives of the provinces and from the non-governmental sector, such as business, labour and the academic world. In drafting this legislation we have been guided by the desirability of giving the board the maximum possible discretion regarding its composition and functioning.

The government has developed a five-year funding strategy of $5 million for the foundation, with an initial financial subvention of $1 million. It is hoped that provincial governments and the non-governmental sector will contribute to the foundation, both by supporting its operations and in a financing context. I am pleased to learn that a number of provincial governments and private sector corporations have already indicated interest in supporting the foundation. It is intended that the federal and provincial governments and the Canadian private sector should work as partners in the operation of this private non-profit and non-partisan foundation.

Honourable senators, the Asia-Pacific region represents a major element in Canada's future. Our security and prosperity will, to a great measure depend on developments across the Pacific. The foundation will symbolize Canada's growing involvement in and commitment to the region, and will provide the means to strengthen mutual understanding with its peoples. It will enhance commercial opportunities and expand human and cultural relations with this dynamic and fascinating area of the world. I would hope, honourable senators, there will be the desire in this chamber to support this legislation and pass this bill as quickly as possible.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask who the sponsor of the bill was in the other place?

Senator Steuart: Do you mean the minister?

Senator Flynn: Yes, it could be.

Senator Steuart: It was the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin.

Senator Flynn: Was the speech that Senator Steuart just read the one that was prepared for the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin? It sounded like that.

Senator Steuart: It sounded like what?

Senator Flynn: It sounded like a speech prepared for the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin and not for you.

Senator Steuart: Well, he is taller than I am, but I handle it pretty well from this area, anyway. The author may be up in the gallery, if you would like him to take a bow.

Senator Flynn: I must praise the sponsor for the deep conviction in which he recited the speech.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

VETERANS AFFAIRS—COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO TRAVEL FROM PLACE TO PLACE IN CANADA

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on 4th April, 1984, to examine the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985, be empowered to travel from place to place within Canada for the purpose of such examination;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than November 1, 1984.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when I adjourned the debate on this order last Thursday it was to have the opportunity to speak to Senator Marshall and Senator Bonnell about the motion. I have done so, and I understand that both of those senators have discussed it and that they have plans to handle this reference, and therefore I suggest that we agree to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES 1984-85

CONSIDERATION OF FOURTH REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Committee on National Finance, tabled on Thursday, May 31, 1984.

[Sensor Flynn.]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, the report is quite comprehensive. It is very technical and if I were to add anything to it, it might create more confusion. Consequently, I refer honourable senators to the fourth report, and I call for its adoption.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think we usually adopt these reports. They are often spoken to and then we simply treat them as having been dealt with if no one has anything to add.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my understanding is that there was no motion. It was simply for consideration.

Senator Frith: That is why I suggested what I did.

I mentioned to Senator Doody, who is Chairman of the National Finance Committee—the report was presented by the deputy chairman—that Senator Leblanc intended to do this, and this is satisfactory to Senator Doody.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: As no other senator wishes to participate, this order is considered debated.

CANADIAN AND EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTS

TWELFTH INTER-PARLIAMENTARY MEETING OF DELEGATIONS—STRASBOURG, FRANCE

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc rose, pursuant to notice of May 29, 1984:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twelfth Inter-Parliamentary Meeting of Delegations of Canadian and European Parliaments held at Strasbourg, France, from March 26 to March 30, 1984.

He said: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I wish to table the report of the Twelfth Annual Meeting of the Delegations of Canadian and European Parliaments, in both official languages of this country. I move that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "B" p. 665.)

Senator Leblanc: Since leave is granted, I shall not read the full report but only give a brief summary. The meeting was held at the Palais de l'Europe in Strasbourg, France, from March 26 to March 30 this year.

The Canadian delegation was led by Aileen Nicholson, President of the Canada-Europe Inter-Parliamentary Association, and I wish to congratulate her on her effective approach to this meeting. Senators Bielish, Kelly, Le Moine and myself and eight members of the House of Commons constituted the Canadian delegation.

I also wish to congratulate the entire delegation on its active, ongoing and effective participation.

The meeting in Strasbourg was held during a plenary session of the European Parliament, so that the Canadian delegation was able to see the Parliament at work. We met the Speaker, Mr. Piet Dankert, and were present when the President of the European Commission, Mr. Gaston Thorn, and the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Claude Cheysson, now President of the Council of European Ministers, tabled their reports.

In the middle of this month, practically at the same time as the Liberal Party leadership convention here in Canada, the European Parliament will be facing its second election. Before the formal discussions got under way, we had an opportunity to gain a better insight into the political atmosphere when we met with the leaders of the six political groups of the European Parliament. In my opinion, it is important to understand how the parties operate in the European Parliament. As honourable senators know, European members do not sit on the basis of their nationality but rather according to their political affiliation. The political groups are a mixture of the political parties of the European Economic Community's ten member nations.

For instance, members of the British Labour Party belong to the socialist group, which includes members of the socialist parties of France, Holland, West Germany and others. The exchange of views of those party leaders made it possible for the Canadian delegation to assess the role of the European Community and its Parliament, and to question them on current issues, including the Community's budgetary crisis, which had been raised by Mrs. Thatcher.

As evidenced by the report which was tabled, the agenda of bilateral discussions between the two delegations was far-reaching. The Canadian delegation pointed out to the Europeans that the latest fishing agreement had not signaled the end of all fishing problems with the EEC. Canada is particularly concerned about what might happen should the Spaniards become members of the EEC—they have applied, as did the Portuguese—and chose to exert pressure to obtain an increase allowing them to fish offshore in Canadian waters. Both delegations expressed concern about declining salmon stocks and recommended negotiations to settle the problem.

During discussions on the EEC's Common Agricultural Policy, the Canadian delegation was critical of the new CAP-imposed levies and import barriers on certain Canadian products as well as of the CAP grant and price support system. European barriers recently established against imports of Canadian newsprint, which Canada finds unacceptable, came up for discussion. The Canadian government has submitted this file to GATT for a decision. During the discussion of the Canadian security measures for uranium exports to the European Community, the Canadian delegation indicated again its concern about the entry of Spain into the Community, that country not having signed the non proliferation treaty.

There was a witty exchange between the two delegations concerning provincial controls over the imports of European wines, Ontario being singled out as not conforming to the agreements entered into following the last GATT round of custom tariff negotiations. The Europeans expressed their misgivings about the provisions of Bill C-6 concerning banking. They criticized the 8 per cent bank assets ceiling imposed on foreign banking operations. Responsible as I was for this matter, I assured them that the Government of Canada would probably follow the advice of the House of Commons' Finance Committee and raise that ceiling.

As you know, honourable senators, several weeks ago the Minister of Finance introduced a bill raising from 8 to 16 per cent the ceiling imposed on foreign banking operations.

The discussions on acid rain have revealed an increasing concern on the part of Europeans for this issue, especially on the part of West Germany parliamentarians who are alarmed by the damage caused to their forests. On the other hand, several British delegates noted that the cleaning up of industrial emissions was increasing production costs and lowering competitiveness on the world markets. While we were exchanging views on energy matters, a few European delegates expressed interest concerning the future availability of Canadian coal. During the discussions on export credits granted to buyers to enhance their competitiveness, both sides recognized that, in the long term, the result would be a distortion of competition. The recent OECD consensus in this regard was considered a step forward; it was obvious that many countries would still offer highly beneficial rates to export.

With respect to the Middle East, the discussions embraced the situation in Lebanon and the recent weaknesses in American policy, the war between Iran and Iraq, the possibility of a blockade in the Strait of Hormuz and the source of weapon supplies for the Middle East. During the exchange on the Stockholm Conference on Disarmament and Weapons Control, the Europeans asked questions about the Trudeau initiative; a good description of this initiative was provided by the Canadian delegates in attendance.

Finally, a European member of Parliament from Greenland explained that, despite the fact that Greenland has voted to withdraw from the European Community by the end of the year, he expected that relations with Canada would grow closer with an increase in contacts with the Inuit people, and there were then discussions on the problems of fishing, the environment and northern transportation.

Following those meetings, the Canadian delegation was able to see some of the damage caused by acid rain in the Vosges forests. The delegates also visited a farm equipment plant. All other details, which are far more complete than the brief summary I have just given, may be found in the report which you allowed me to table.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, since no other senator wants to address the issue, I consider the debate closed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 8 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"(See p. 657)STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE FIFTH REPORT*REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1985

Monday, June 4, 1984

The Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985, were referred, does in obedience to the Order of Reference of May 22, 1984, report as follows:

The Committee heard evidence from the following witnesses from the Treasury Board: Mr. J. L. Manion, Secretary; Mr. Jean Jacques Noreau, Deputy Secretary, Program Branch; Mr. Michael Francino, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch.

In this first supplementary, six departments and agencies requested supplementary funds of $296 million bringing the total estimates to date for 1984-85 to $96.8 billion dollars. All items proposed in the supplementary estimates require parliamentary approval; there are no statutory items nor are there any one dollar votes in these supplementary estimates.

Approximately one-half of these supplementary estimates ($151 million) are for employment related initiatives in three departments and agencies. In the past the government has sought additional funds for job creation through the various supplementary estimates; it is unlikely that these figures represent the total spending on job creation.

These estimates provide for an additional 787 person-years, of which 775 are associated with direct job creation projects in two of the three departments receiving employment related funds. Treasury Board officials explained that the person year requirement for direct job creation fluctuates significantly throughout the year as temporary staff are hired during the summer months for the peak work period and then released. These figures are slightly less than the number required in 1983-84.

CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

REPORT
TWELFTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE DELEGATIONS
FROM THE CANADIAN AND EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTS

STRASBOURG, MARCH 26 - 30 1984

At the twelfth annual meeting of delegations from the Canadian and European Parliaments held in Strasbourg, France from March 26 to 30, 1984, the parliamentarians discussed not only bilateral questions, but also issues of mutual concern to Canada and the European Community (EC) and several international issues. A copy of the agenda covered is appended to this report (See Annex A).

The Strasbourg meeting took place during a plenary session of the European Parliament (EP). Prior to the beginning of the discussions between the two delegations, the Canadian delegation was formally recognized in the visitors' gallery at the Palais de l'Europe by the EP President, Piet Dankert. Subsequently Canadian members had meetings with chairmen or representatives of the six political groups sitting in the EP. Each of these groups is itself made up of a mix of political parties from the ten EC member states. The Canadian delegation was also able to have a brief exchange of views with EP President Dankert and to be present at the parliamentary session to hear reports by the Presidents of the Commission, Mr. Gustav Thörn and the French Foreign Minister Mr. Claude Cheysson who is the current President of the EC Council of Ministers.

Highlight of the discussion with political group leaders

See Annex 'B' for a list of the representatives of the six EP political groups participating in meetings with the Canadian delegation prior to the bilateral discussions.

Since the Euro-MPs were facing their second direct election in June, the Canadians found it of interest to discuss with the group leaders the developing role of the EP within the Community; the unifying role of the Community within Western Europe; the issues likely to be debated during the election campaign; the likely turnout at the polls in the various member states; and the differing electoral systems. There was a discussion of the increasing levels of political co-operation among the ten EC states with a Euro-MP pointing out that the single EC viewpoint was expressed for the first time on security matters in Stockholm by one ministerial spokesman. The problems associated with enlargement of the Community to include Spain and Portugal were touched on briefly. Finally, mindful of the budgetary crisis which was gripping the EC leaders and ministers at the time, the Canadian delegation took the opportunity to ask about the problems associated with the Common Agricultural Policy including the possibility of future cutbacks in the present subsidy system which was the main cause of the budgetary deficits and the serious overproduction. On this point while several EP leaders agreed that CAP subsidies will have to be decreased to control overproduction, another Group chairman maintained that the CAP system was an important factor for EC social equilibrium.

During the encounter with President Piet Dankert, the Canadian delegation pressed for the possibility of small sub-committees being able to meet and study particularly thorny bilateral issues if and when they arose. The President agreed it would be useful to have parliamentary experts such as Committee rapporteurs consult on specific irritants but he had not yet found a system of linking this to the fixed delegation membership which the EP sets up for each institutionalized parliamentary relationship during each Parliament.

Summary of bilateral discussions

Fisheries

Opening the discussion on fisheries, a European delegate noted that last year's problems with the Canada-EC Long Term Fisheries Agreement (LTA) seemed to have been resolved and Canadian fish products have now been given increased access to EC and particularly UK markets. He did not foresee any major problems. But a Canadian member from Newfoundland disagreed, pointing to several areas of potential problems. He explained there had been an extensive restructuring of the Canadian deep sea fishing industry with resulting unemployment. The fishermen had had no price increases for three years and equipment and trawlers were old. As a result, new pressure was being focussed on the allocations of fish to foreign vessels. This pressure in turn would depend on market performance even though factors such as the exchange rate and the current call by anti-sealers for a boycott on Canadian fish products could affect the market as well. Furthermore, the Canadian fishing industry was watching apprehensively the EC enlargement negotiations with Spain and Portugal, fearful of what the entry of these states would mean to Community fish stocks and what new pressures would be felt on North Atlantic fish allocations. For all these reasons, the LTA arrangements could still face problems. The foreign allocations would undoubtedly be an election issue in Canada.

Joining the delegations for the fisheries discussion, the Chairman of the EP Fisheries Committee noted the Community's current satisfaction with the LTA. But he told the Canadians it was important that permits be granted early enough before the ice comes down. Also UK fish processors were interested in having Canadian minced fish blocks come in at the former lower duty rate. The Chairman admitted that Spain's entry would cause some dislocation in EC's internal fisheries allocation as Spain had no historic rights in their waters. The Community was hoping that waters off Brazil or off Africa might accommodate the 1 million metric tonne (m.t.) Spanish catch capacity. But in any case he assured the Canadians that the EC would not encourage Spain to expand into Canadian, Greenland or EC fishing waters.

The Canadian spokesman replied that the Flemish Cap fisheries, an area off Newfoundland beyond the Canadian 200-mile jurisdiction, was being destroyed by Spanish 'pair-fishing', a situation which was compounded by the fact that 50 per cent of this Spanish catch was flounder which was then dumped. There was overfishing of other groundfish species as well. The same problem affected the area known as the "Nose and Tail" of the Bank and unless there was some control or improvement, Canada might be forced to take unilateral action to extend its fisheries jurisdiction out to the "Nose and Tail", this spokesman said.

The seal question was raised briefly in connection with the effect of seals on fish stocks. Spokesmen on both sides agreed that a management plan for seals was required but the timing at present was not appropriate. The EP spokesman said that in the end consumers would be enraged if the fish stocks were allowed to be depleted by seal population explosion.

Salmon

The first European spokesman then turned to another aspect of bilateral fisheries which he considered required urgent attention, namely the drastically low level of Atlantic salmon being caught. In Scotland, the Faroes and Greenland, the reported catch last year had declined alarmingly, with Greenland taking only about one-third of its allocated tonnage. There was anxiety that the salmon stocks could be seriously in danger.

The Newfoundland delegate reported the same low salmon catch in Canada and a similar concern. Commercial salmon fishing in Newfoundland had had to be cut back and sports fishing restricted. Greenland's allocation had always been a worry to Canada as almost half their salmon spawned in Canadian rivers, he stated.

A Greenland delegate acknowledged that Greenland too was concerned by the drop in the salmon catch although in the past five years Greenland had noted considerable large fluctuations in catches. In 1978, for example, there had been a poor catch whereas in 1979 the 1,190 metric tonne allocation had been considerably exceeded, to about 1,390 m.t. Was the cause biological, a bad survival rate for smolts one year or was there a change in salmon migration routes due to extremely cold winters, he asked. In any case, Greenland's government was ready to listen to whatever the ICES (International Council for the Exploration of the Seas) group recommended. Despite the departure of Greenland from the EC at the end of 1983, this member assured the Canadians that Greenland would continue to be a part of ICES and NAFO (Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization). He admitted that Greenland had problems with fishermen taking more than their quota but stressed that there was no poaching in Greenland whereas in Canada and the UK the catch figures did not take the poaching into account. Greenland would like to see Canada institute a regulatory regime at the mouth of the rivers and at sea. But he reiterated that Greenland was ready for serious talks and was prepared to carry some of the burden for corrective action.

A Canadian, also from an East Coast area, pointed out that under the Law of the Sea arrangement, the country where salmon spawn bears a responsibility for management. Accordingly, in 1972 Canada had banned salmon fishing from the Gulf of St. Lawrence at a cost of $15 million paid to commercial fishermen in compensation for not fishing, although some monitored sports fishing was permitted. But stocks continued to decline and Greenland fishermen and the seals were blamed. This year commercial fishing will be restricted or in some cases banned entirely from certain northern New Brunswick areas and south Newfoundland. Another Canadian participant wondered if the drop in the salmon catch could be a cyclical problem although this suggestion was disputed by the Canadian spokesman.

Common Agricultural Policy (CAP)

Beginning with criticisms of the CAP's effect on wheat production, a Canadian spokesman subsequently raised specific complaints concerning increased levies on imports of cereal substitutes, a new EC tax on fats and oils and revised requirements respecting meat hygiene. Canada was concerned at the rapid expansion of the Community exports of wheat from 5 to 16 million tonnes in five years, he said. Canadian exports had only grown from 16 million to 19 million tonnes in the same period. The explanation was the high EC support prices and heavy subsidization of exports. Moreover, Canada was fearful of being caught in the current EC-US agricultural war which would result in low world grain prices. While last year's US payment-in-kind (PIK) program and a poor growing season had resulted in good prices, this year there was no PIK program and no optimism about prices. This speaker reminded the Europeans that 50 cents out of every dollar of Canadian farmers comes from export, that three-quarters of Canadian wheat is exported and that the Community takes 12 percent of Canada's agricultural exports.

Canadian exports of cereal substitutes have been affected by the EC levies on cereal substitutes, continued the Canadian spokesman. As for the tax on oils and fats, this would seriously affect Canadian oil seed exports, 25 per cent of which go to the Community. In reality, that tax was designed as an indirect method of reducing the EC dairy surplus by raising prices of competitive products. Canada was also objecting to the new meat hygiene standards which would affect the French horse-meat market for Canadian exports. Canadian meat inspection was good and he wondered if the new EC standards were an NTB. If a real problem existed, Canada needed time to readjust its plants, he said.

The European spokesman responded it now seemed likely that the oils and fat tax would be unacceptable to certain EC member states because, while the tax had been originally instituted only for imported products, this had been found to be contrary to GATT rules. Now the Commission had broadened the application to all oils within the Community except butter and this was affecting the Mediterranean member states. As for the cereal substitute levies, the problem was more difficult since observers were saying that surplus of the EC grain was equal to imports. Certainly some EC producers such as pig farmers were facing far too high cereal prices mainly because the founding fathers had originally pitched EC prices too high. The Community would eventually have to align its prices with world prices he predicted. Over 40 per cent of the budget is now involved in subsidies to put EC products on world markets.

A German delegate disputed the Canadian charges of excessive subsidization resulting in the huge increase in EC grain exports. Rather, European production increases were due to new technology and the use of fertilizers. Moreover Canada, through the Crownest Pass transportation rates, was heavily subsidizing its own wheat exports. In reply, the Canadian delegate said Canadian subsidies were neither as high as those in the United States or in the EC. Canada could not afford this level. Moreover for market reasons, 25 millions of acres in Western Canada had been taken out of production. Canada was doing its share.

Newsprint

A European participant explained that from January 1, 1984, under the terms of the EC-EFTA free trade agreement of 1973, EFTA producers, notably Sweden, would have unlimited duty-free access for newsprint exports into the EC. Accordingly, the EC was reducing its GATT bound import limit of 1.5 million tonnes annually from MFN producers and was proposing a quota of 500,000 tonnes for Canada for 1984. Canada had not accepted this level and was putting its case before GATT. This spokesman noted that recent Canadian imports had been about 670,000 tonnes a year, some of which had entered under 'autonomous' duty-free quotas which the Community had opened year by year as it considered necessary. The possibility of such an additional 'autonomous' quota was expected to continue. On the other hand, he noted that the publishers within the EC wanted open free competition with no reduced quotas on imports as they feared higher prices.

A Canadian member responded by setting the dispute in a wider context, that is the importance to Canada of its export trade, which represents 30 per cent of GNP, and the parallel importance of the forestry industry to the whole economy. Clearly the EC quota stood as a significant barrier to Canadian newsprint exports as did the watermark requirement. What was worrying to Canada was that if the GATT were to rule against Canada, and he himself was concerned that Canada might not have a strong case, the pressures in Canada for retaliatory protectionism would rise in other sectors with a resulting danger of serious trade deterioration. Another Canadian pointed out that the EC has been an historic market for Canadian newsprint exports. The present level of its exports was unusually low due to the exchange rate.

A UK participant remarked he had been lobbied by the UK publishers who wanted to see the traditional Canadian level of imports maintained and there were other sources of unease in the Community over this issue.

Canada-Euratom Agreement on Uranium Supply

An EP delegate, a member of the Parliament's Energy Committee, raised a number of Community concerns regarding the current bilateral negotiation on uranium exports. How long, he asked, would the bilateral contractual arrangement run—for a fixed period or with a possibility of termination on six months' notice? To what extent could Canadian uranium be sold to other countries by the EC which has had offers to sell it? In respect to technical reactor research, would there be a possibility of Canada and the EC carrying out joint research? The Chairman of the EP Energy Committee, who joined the discussions briefly, added that Canadian conditions and restrictions on its uranium sales were the most stringent of all countries and this caused the EC difficulties when it wanted to sell its nuclear items to other countries.

A Canadian spokesman stated that the EC was a reliable partner and for its part Canada could give an assured uranium supply. But the Canadian public wanted the government to retain stringent safeguards. He noted the substantial investment by European interests in Saskatchewan uranium mining companies. As for reactor research, Canada was interested in selling its CANDU technology and would undoubtedly be looking at joint research projects. This delegate also raised the question of Spain's entry into the Community and the fact that it had not signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT). He urged the Community to make Spain's ratification of the NPT a condition of entry. The Canadian government would undoubtedly be questioned closely on this point.

The EP Energy Committee Chairman remarked that while she did not know whether this issue was being discussed with the Spaniards she assumed that Spain would be required to sign the NPT before entry.

An EP inquiry as to the strength of the Canadian anti-nuclear movement brought the reply that currently the Canadian nuclear industry was 'on hold', reflecting the fact that many Canadians were unhappy about increased nuclear energy electricity. A Canadian Senator mentioned the recent International Energy Agency's (IEA) study which challenged the assumption that the light water system was the best. His remarks were supported by an UK member who recalled that the UK Energy Committee had recommended the heavy water CANDU system but the government had gone for the light water system. Despite Ontario Hydro's recent problems with the CANDU, the Ontario government intended to press ahead with nuclear development, said the Senator.

The EP Energy Committee Chairman commented that France and Belgium were the Community's main producers and users of nuclear-generated electricity. A 75 per cent majority in the European Parliament had voted for nuclear development and the EC planned for 30 per cent of its energy to be nuclear-generated by 1990. Opposition focussed on reprocessing as well as the siting and methods of radioactive waste disposal. This participant emphasized that reprocessing could reduce the amount of such waste to 3 per cent or eventually to 1½ per cent of normal reactor waste. As for disposal, there was a project which still required testing involving depositing of non-processed waste in an old mine in Sweden where it could be mined and reused. A Canadian Senator said there were also nuclear waste disposal proposals in Canada. In Ontario a Chamber of Commerce group had even identified potential areas for such disposal on a commercial basis.

The European Chairman suggested that the subjects of reprocessing and nuclear waste disposal should be on the agenda for the next annual meeting.

Provincial Liquor Controls

A lively exchange on the subject of provincial controls on spirits and wine sales began with a UK delegate's criticism of what he termed the provinces' Soviet-type, monopolistic liquor outlets whose practices resulted in difficulties for European wine or spirit companies trying to sell new products in the Canadian market. Listings were done haphazardly and were difficult to obtain. The worst problem was with Ontario where 45 per cent of all EC sales were made. While the Community had made an arrangement with the federal government, Ontario had imposed discriminatory mark-ups and handling charges which in total amounted to mark-up of 123 per cent for imported wines but only 58 per cent for domestic wines. In addition, Ontario gave discounts to local restaurants which purchased Canadian wines. Last year, under pressure from United States, Ontario reduced the handling charges but then widened the mark-up again with a minimum reference price which discriminated against low-priced EC imports. Most EC member countries were affected but particularly Italy. Even cider was difficult to have listed with the excuse of lack of volume sales given. These practices were contrary to the Statement of Intent agreed to by the provinces at the GATT Tokyo Round. The Community, reacting to pressure from Euro-MPs, was probably going to file a complaint against Canada in the GATT, said this spokesman.

In response, a Canadian Senator explained that the idea behind the monopoly liquor outlets of the provinces originated in the Puritan ethic whereby governments could not be seen to make drinking easy. He asserted there were clear criteria for listings which were not distorted by political considerations. Despite the fact that after removing the handling charges Ontario had reinstated higher mark-ups, it should be noted that Canada was still the EC's second largest market for these products despite its relatively small population. While the Ontario reference price might have been thought to have a detrimental effect on Italian and French lower-priced wines, in fact the opposite was the case and sales of these wines had increased. As for European cider, there was no market in Canada for it and not adequate space for supplies. This delegate questioned whether the Statement of Intent agreed to in 1979 was, in fact, a GATT document. Furthermore, GATT Article 17 relating to state trading agencies did not appear to imply a requirement for national treatment.

New Canadian Import Policy

Concern was expressed by the European side, which had put this item on the agenda, that new Canadian legislation dealing with countervail policies and anti-dumping procedures reflected a move to increased Canadian protectionism.

The Canadian Chairman explained that there was at this time no new Canadian policy, but a Bill (C-8) was now before the House on the subject. It was designed to bring Canadian procedures on anti-dumping and countervail producers in line with GATT in certain respects. The Bill had not as yet been referred to Committee but when it was, the Committee would undoubtedly hear witnesses and amend the Bill. Responding to an EP inquiry as to whether the earlier report of the Mackasey Committee had a link to the Bill, the Canadian spokesman replied that the report had been one input but there would be others including the viewpoints of exporters and importers. She added that it would be useful to have the European suggestions prior to amending the Bill, a copy of which she handed to the European side. Another Canadian delegate commented that an underlying thrust of the projected legislations was to simplify the investigation process and speed up various procedures.

Canadian Banking Legislation

The focus of EP concern on the Canadian banking legislation was the Bank Act limitation on foreign banks' operation to 8 per cent of Canada's banking assets. Canadian banks were not subject to such limitations when operating abroad, a European delegate stated. Could European banks have any basis for their hope that this ceiling which was detrimental to growth would be lifted, she asked.

A Canadian Senator explained that in 1980 an amendment to the Bank Act had permitted for the first time foreign banks to operate in Canada, already a step forward. Last year, the House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs had studied the question of foreign banks in Canada and had issued a report recommending, among other things, that the 8 per cent limitation be lifted. He himself was optimistic that the government would respond either by raising the ceiling or removing it completely. However, he cautioned that this might not take place before the next election.*

Environmental Issues

A member of the EP environment committee who joined the delegations for this discussion outlined the EP's grave concerns over the effects of atmospheric pollution within the Community. The damage was already extensive, she said, ranging from high lead levels in children in the UK to extensive forest damage which was especially severe in Germany and major architectural damage to ancient Athenian monuments. The European Parliament had passed a detailed resolution on acid rain in January, calling on the Commission to take action in a number of areas including measures for lead-free petrol and programs to reduce industrial pollution emissions of sulphur oxide and nitrogen oxide. The Council of Ministers was negotiating with the member states on lead-free petrol and the only remaining problems were with France and Italy.

A Canadian member responded by explaining that Canadians too were extremely concerned by the problems being caused by acid rain. He reviewed the steps taken in Canada. Recognition of the problem in 1978 had led to the establishment of a joint Canada-US research group and by 1980 the two countries had signed a Memorandum of Intent to work toward an agreement to reduce air pollution and to enforce existing standards. But although Canada agreed in 1982 to reduce its emissions by 50 per cent by 1990 if the United States did the same, the US Government did not respond positively. A Parliamentary Committee to study the acid rain problem was set up. It held extensive meetings across Canada and abroad and published a report which became a 'best seller'. One of the Committee's recommendations was to urge an extensive publicity campaign to try to pressure the United States into action. Excellent US publicity in fact did result when a Canadian film on acid rain was inexplicably banned in the United States and environmentalists protested nationwide. Again in 1984 President Reagan rebuffed Canada's urgings for a bilateral air pollution treaty and only reiterated the need for more research. Canadian federal and provincial environment ministers agreed this year to reduce emissions on their own by 50 per cent by 1994. Finally in March 1984 the Canadian Environment Minister convoked his ministerial counterparts from 10 European countries, members of "the 30 per cent club"—that is, countries which had agreed to reduce sulphur emissions by 30 per cent—to a conference in Ottawa to reaffirm their commitment and to press to implement the ECE Convention on the subject. The United States, which had not committed itself to such a reduction, was not invited to attend as a participant but only as an observer.

Responding to a comment by the EP Chairman that recommendations to reduce emissions must recognize the costs involved and that diminished industrial competitiveness would result, the EP Environment Committee member said the cost of atmospheric pollution must also be measured along with the jobs lost in the forest industry and health costs due to respiratory diseases. She argued that the cost of the state of preventative action would be less in the end and asked rhetorically whether the Japanese, who had installed 235 desulphurization plants, could be called uncompetitive. She estimated that if the Federal German Republic were to move to desulphurization it would cost about the same as one nuclear plant.

Another EP delegate said that while he favoured moving to lead-free petrol, to reduce coal usage and to increasing nuclear power plants, he questioned whether it was known precisely what was causing the Black Forest damage. The EP Environment Committee member asserted that atmospheric pollution was certainly the cause but whether it was due to sulphur oxide or nitrogen oxide was as yet unclear.

A Canadian delegate stressed the danger of devastating damage to forests not only in North America and Europe but in South America and Mexico. If forest pollution were not curbed, within 25 years the whole planet would be endangered. Another Canadian suggested that in order to help industry bear what is really a social expense, a national tax could help. The EP delegation Chairman suggested that the subject of air pollution be on next year's agenda.

Energy

A discussion on energy was introduced by an EP delegate who regretted the fact that the Community had no Common Energy Policy. Present EC policy, he said, emphasized conservation. In the EC, gas and oil consumption was down while nuclear power was the only sector showing any growth. He inquired about Canada's energy situation, whether Canadian coal exports would push into European markets, and how soon Canadian LNG gas would be marketable. Another EP delegate added that EC coal pits were no longer competitive and EC coal imports would have to increase. Already South African and Australian coal was coming into the UK cheaper than domestic coal.

* Two weeks after the Canada-EP parliamentary encounter, the Canadian Minister of Finance introduced a bill in the House of Commons to raise the ceiling on foreign banks from 8 per cent to 16 per cent.

A Canadian spokesman said energy development in Canada had been slowed by decreased demand and lower oil prices as well as the negative reaction of some parts of the industry to the government's National Energy Program. Alberta with an abundant oversupply of natural gas was particularly affected. Provincial governments such as Saskatchewan have tried to encourage development by granting a 5 year royalty holiday. The Supreme Court's determination, granting off-shore rights to the federal government, had resolved the jurisdictional dispute although the debate with Newfoundland still had to be settled. As for Canadian coal sales to Europe, Canadian suppliers were ready for business and would welcome European interest. West Coast producers were already involved in joint ventures with the Japanese. For LNG, the market looked dim and the Arctic Pilot Project (APP) was on a "back burner". A Canadian Senator added that the APP would undoubtedly go ahead, that there was a commitment in Canada to develop heavy oils and that he found the EC interest in Canadian coal encouraging. In response to a EP delegate's criticism that Canadian oil pricing policy gave Canadian industry unfair trade advantages, the senator disagreed and added that the Canadian price was very near the world price in any case. Another Canadian delegate noted that Canada had unlimited potential for hydro-electricity generation although there was some shortage of financing. New agreements had been concluded to increase electricity exports to US markets.

While the Canadian spokesman said coal liquefaction was not a priority item in Canada, a European delegate urged co-operation in research in this area. On future EC coal developments, the EP member disagreed with the views of the UK participant, maintaining that while there would be fewer coal pits they would be producing more coal, more efficiently. He himself did not foresee a major shift to increase coal imports by the EC and predicted instead that energy exporting countries would face future problems as industrialized countries emphasized their indigenous supplies and the need for increased self-sufficiency.

Consensus or Competition in Export Credits?

The problems created by competitive export support measures have steadily worsened in recent years, said an EP delegate. Such export subsidies could take the form of export financing programs, foreign currency financing, mixed credits, project financing and export credit insurance. In respect to foreign currency financing, the fluctuating exchange and interest rates for various currencies have proved disadvantageous for some companies and their governments have tried to compensate. As for project financing, long-term loans granted by private banks and underwritten by governments have increased markedly in the past five years especially for large scale projects. Further, up to 95 per cent of exporters' risks are being covered by national insurance entities. All of these practices have helped capture export business but they have distorted competition, a detrimental result in the long run.

The OECD has attempted since 1976 to slow down this race, continued the EP delegate who was rapporteur for a recent study on export credit subsidies by the EP Committee on External Economic Relations. OECD 'consensus' guidelines were established in 1976 but were widely departed from particularly from 1978 to 1981, a time of serious exchange rate and interest rate fluctuations. In 1983 a much improved 'consensus' was reached. Particularly useful was the newly agreed minimum interest rates which can be automatically readjusted on the basis of fluctuations in a basket of SDR currencies. However, hardly was the ink dry on this agreement, said the EP spokesman, when the United States called again for further reduction in subsidies.

A Canadian spokesman said that since the bulk of Canadian exports go to the United States, the risk factor for most Canadian exporters is minimal and export credit insurance was not widely used by Canadians. Export credit and supports are involved in only about 5 per cent of Canadian export sales but as long as other competing countries use such supports, Canada must also help its exporters to remain competitive. Most frequently used methods by exporters have been offers of delayed payment terms and very long term financing, but more recently some exporting countries are tying their export sales to their willingness to supply other goods including armaments. Moreover, the introduction of mixed credits, that is, development aid combined with export loans, have made it more difficult for Canada to compete. This spokesman said it was in the Community's own interest to take the lead in stemming these practices as EC member states were competing against themselves. He noted that the Canadian Prime Minister had warned the World Bank that if it did not try to ensure a fairer bidding system on Bank projects, Canada would review its contributions. The developing countries tended to play each exporter against his competitors. However, this delegate admitted that Canada too had been capable of hard competitive bargaining involving concessional financing to get a recent major US contract against European competitors.

The European spokesman replied that Western European exporters had been disadvantaged in export markets in recent years by the strong US dollar but nevertheless the Community was actively trying to improve the problem. Moreover the EP Committee's report on the subject had stressed the need for consensus interest rates and a unified position by member states and had recommended that the Commission draw up an inventory of export aid systems and require prior Community consultation before any new national measure could be introduced. Further it had recommended the establishment of a European Export Bank in order to use the ecu as the only currency for EC export credits, allowing for easier monitoring.

In reply to a Canadian inquiry, the EP delegate explained that agricultural products had been excluded from coverage by the OECD consensus as it had not been possible to reach agreement in this sector or in the aviation or nuclear sectors.

Middle East

In introducing the subject of the Middle East, the EP Chairman spoke first of the reversal of US policy in Lebanon where President Reagan had put an unwarranted trust in the multilateral force and of his misplaced support for the US-backed Israel-Lebanese peace agreement which Lebanon had now abrogated. In the face of the Gemayel government's weakness, Moslems had gained control of the area north of the Israeli line. It was evident from the Lausanne conference that the Christian Maronites could not agree to sharing power. Meanwhile the Syrians are in control of two-thirds of the Bekaa Valley and one wonders what the Russian involvement is. As for the Iran-Iraq war which he described as a 'powder keg', the spokesman wondered what the source of the poison gas being used was. The goal of Khomeini was to extend the fundamentalist Moslem faith. But what initiative could the West take to forestall him since the United States was discredited through its Lebanese errors and, in any case, was in a pre-election period? In response to a Canadian comment, he agreed that the EC had made progress toward a co-ordinated EC foreign policy formulation and perhaps Europe through NATO should take some initiative. The Community itself is precluded from so doing by the Treaty of Rome. Europe's oil imports were at stake in any closure of the Straits of Hormuz.

A Canadian spokesman said that a central policy of the Canadian government in respect to the Middle East situation was that the Palestinians must be given a homeland. In Lebanon it had been evident that US negotiators had made a serious miscalculation in not including the Syrians in the Lebanese-Israel arrangements. Canada had said it would be prepared to participate in an eventual peacekeeping force in the area under certain conditions. She noted that there had been a shift in Canadian public opinion respecting Israel after the Sabra and Chatilla massacre and also that Canadians were dismayed by the support given by US presidential candidates to a proposal to move the US Embassy to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv because it blackened the US image throughout the Arab world. As for the Iran-Iraq war, Canada was appalled at the use of gas and the involvement of young children. Nor has Canada agreed to reopen its Embassy in Teheran since the Iranians continued to insist that Canada apologize for assisting the American hostages.

Another Canadian member added that the arms supplies to Iran and Iraq appeared to be coming from Europe. The European spokesman agreed that the French government had sold Super-Etendard fighters to the Iraq government but that otherwise the countries were being supplied by the international arms dealers. A French delegate said French arms deliveries to Iraq were an arrangement of arms for oil which had been inherited by the present government. Relations between Iran and France are strained, he said. He noted the fact the US arms were going to Israel and thence to Iran. In Lebanon where there was civil war, France had proposed a UN peace-keeping force but had been opposed.

A Euro-MP joining the group for this discussion thought that the USSR was motivated by a fear of a Moslem fundamentalist revolution among its own 50 million Moslems and it might assist Iraq if Iran appeared to gain the upper hand. This could lead to a war of greater dimensions particularly if the Hormuz Straits were closed. In reply to a Canadian inquiry about how seriously Europeans viewed the danger of a blocking of the Straits, the EP Chairman replied that it was taken very seriously because Khomeini was neither a rational nor logical leader and might take action even if it meant injury to Iran.

There was a brief exchange on the difficulties of controlling international shipments of armaments with a Canadian member explaining that Canada did not permit arms exports. European delegates said that politically the banning of exports of arms was impossible in the UK and France. The armament industries were saying they could not exist without the international trade and even President Mitterand found himself faced with the fact that the recipient countries would buy elsewhere and would refuse to participate in French technological ventures if they were cut off from arms purchases.

The Stockholm Conference and the Trudeau Initiative

An EP delegate reviewed the situation in East-West disarmament talks in the past few years. In her opinion the most important objectives of the Stockholm conference were to find some mutually agreed confidence-building measures to reduce the risk of war; to increase, through more transparency, the effectiveness of disarmament verification procedures; and to find some mutually agreed arrangement on conventional forces. She inquired about the Trudeau initiative.

A Canadian participant explained that Mr. Trudeau's initiative grew from a growing awareness that international tension had grown in the past year despite the 1983 Williamsburg Summit leaders' commitments to reduce tension. A Canadian task force was formed and Mr. Trudeau had given a series of speeches and undertaken international consultations which were in no way meant to supplant ongoing negotiations between the superpowers. Rather, his plan was to see if tensions could be lessened by a 'walk in the woods' technique rather than by megaphone diplomacy. He visited numerous world capitals both in Eastern and Western Europe, in China and in the United States, talking to leaders trying to get them to cool the harsh rhetoric, to persuade them that there were at least 10 principles of common interest between East and West which needed restating including such basic assumptions as nuclear wars cannot be won and nuclear wars must never be fought. The Prime Minister's initiative had gained considerable support abroad and widespread support within Canada where its objectives were being endorsed on a non-partisan basis. A new institute was being proposed in Canada to further, through research, international peace and security.

Another Canadian participant confirmed that all three Canadian political parties supported the Prime Minister's initiative. This delegate drew attention to the lack of any meaningful communication between the NATO and Warsaw Pact groups. He noted the widespread perception of insecurity particularly among youth and the dangerous self-congratulatory reaction of some Americans after their "war" with Grenada.

A German Euro-MP who joined the delegation for the discussion observed that while disarmament initiatives are welcomed, they have not so far been successful. He maintained that the West must be armed and prepared or the other side would attack. Eventually the other side would recognize this firmness. He was critical of publicity issued by peace groups which had the effect of frightening the youth. The EP Chairman concluded the discussion by saying that Europe with NATO should perhaps try to plan a new initiative for disarmament for 1985.

Greenland

Although Greenland was not an agenda subject for discussion, a Greenland Euro-MP wished to point out that Greenland would leave the Community at the end of 1984 and to reassure Canadians of its future policy directions. In 1982 Greenlanders had voted by 52 to 46 per cent to withdraw from the EC. In final documents signed in March 1984 Greenland gains an overseas-country-and-territory status (OTC), allowing tariff free entry to the EC for its exports. In respect to fisheries which had been the source of Greenland's discontent in the Community, a 10 year EC-Greenland framework agreement had been concluded with 5 year protocols on quotas. This delegate made it clear that Greenland would not be separating from Denmark with which it had been linked since 1721. Denmark would still be responsible for its external affairs, monetary affairs and defence. But the Greenland government wanted jurisdiction within the 200-mile limit, jurisdiction to fix its own total allowable catch and to formulate its own regulations and inspection rules.

As for Canada-Greenland relations, these should flourish, he predicted, with increased cultural contacts between the Inuit populations as well as contacts within the Inuit Circumpolar Conference which itself could produce trade links. There would be stronger consultations within NATO. He noted the conclusion of the Canada-Greenland Environmental Agreement on the Davis Strait and suggested bilateral conservation programs for cod stocks in the Strait in the face of serious overfishing. There would also be bilateral contacts concerning salmon conservation. Finally, this participant proposed a link between the Greenland Assembly and the Canadian Parliament.

In reply, a Canadian delegate welcomed the idea of closer Greenland-Canada relations noting that these could take place in respect to fisheries, the Inuit, northern development and northern transportation. He himself had urged for some time the establishment of a Canadian Consulate in Greenland. He proposed a joint commission which would monitor border water problems along the Davis Strait.

*ANNEX AAGENDAI) Bilateral Issues

1. The situation in the fishing industry following the recent agreement between Canada and the EC; salmon in the North Atlantic.
2. The CAP; specific trade irritants: cereal substitutes, oils and fats and meat hygiene.
3. Canadian newsprint exports to the EC.
4. Renewal of the Canadian-Euratom agreement on uranium supplies.
5. Provincial Liquor Board practices regarding importation of spirituous beverages.

6. New Canadian import policy.

7. New Canadian banking legislation.

II) Issues of Mutual Interest for Canada and the EC

1. Environment: forest conservation; acid rain.
2. Energy: update on Canadian situation, progress on the development of new energy source.
3. Consensus or competition on export credit?

III) International Issues

1. The Stockholm Conference.
2. The Middle East.
3. Greenland.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, June 12, 1984, I shall call the attention of the Senate to the establishment of the Murray Anthony Elia Chair in Canadian Italian Studies at York University.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

RECONSTRUCTION OF SPEAKERS' ENTRANCES

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Today at noon the weather was so nice that I decided to walk around the Centre Block. I noticed all of the work being done on the Speaker's entrance of the House of Commons, on the Speaker's entrance of the Senate, around the monument in front and everywhere. I was wondering whether the Leader of the Government can assure us that there will be enough work to be done until the election takes place.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure whether I can answer that question positively, but I am sure that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition will agree with me that we should keep the houses in good order, no matter who occupies them.

Senator Flynn: Even if we have to waste money.

Senator Olson: I did not agree that there was any waste of money.

Senator Flynn: No, I know that you would not.

Senator Olson: Of course not.

CANADIAN SPORTS POOL CORPORATION

APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Does the Leader of the Government have an answer to the question I asked about the appointments to the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if Senator Asselin reads yesterday's Hansard, he will see that an answer was given—perhaps not an adequate answer but a complete one—to the question he raised.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Adequate, perhaps, to us but not to him.

Senator Olson: Well, yes, adequate to us.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Guay, P. C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Watt, for the second reading of the Bill C-44, intituled: "An Act to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act".—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators—

Hon. D. G. Steuart: I have an old speech over here that you can have.

Senator Flynn: I would like to reply to Senator Steuart but it would be irrelevant, of course, because he wants to revive memories of his two speeches of last night. I think we might as well forget both of them. If they had been speeches prepared by him I would not say that. The point is that they were rather impersonal and that is why I made that remark. I think Senator Steuart is one of the most interesting speakers in this house—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn:—when he delivers a genuine speech of his own, but that is not very often the case. I must say, however, that I well remember some of his speeches, especially when he was defending the veto power of the Senate and, later on, when he voted for the constitutional resolution taking away that power of veto in constitutional matters.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Yes, we do remember those.

Senator Flynn: Anyway, as I said before, any comment on Senator Steuart's intervention would be irrelevant and I apologize to the Senate for having done that.

[Translation]

Now, honourable senators, to get on with Senator Guay's excellent speech on the bill concerning—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: I listened to it with great attention, I read it again today and, frankly, I have absolutely nothing to add. I think it is an essential bill which will not solve the problem but, as the saying goes, "Half a loaf is better than no loaf at all".

For that reason, while acknowledging the merit of Senator Guay for having so convincingly urged the Senate to adopt this bill, I can only tell him that we agree.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I have to inform the Senate that, if Senator Guay speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of the bill.

[English]

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I would like to say that there is no doubt but that the Leader of the Opposition understands this bill. His comprehension of it is far beyond my expectation. I can see that he appreciates something which will benefit all Canadians.

To that end, I say to him that I appreciate his comments. On behalf of Senator Lucier, on whose behalf I presented this bill yesterday, and the citizens of Yukon, I wish to thank him once again.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, it has been suggested that this bill should be given third reading at the next sitting of the house. Therefore, I move a motion to that effect.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Guay should never listen to the advice of Senator Leblanc.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I protest. I simply told Senator Guay to stand up when the Honourable the Speaker pro tempore put the question.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it may be an appropriate time to remind the house with respect to what we have come to call the "Flynn formula". That is to say, even though we are all in agreement with a certain bill there is normally a day between second and third readings. If we are not rushed for Royal Assent, then there is no reason to give the bill third reading the same day as it is given second reading.

Senator Flynn: We never know if a minister will make a statement or something of that nature.

On motion of Senator Guay, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY TREATY IMPLEMENTATION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Steuart, seconded by the Honourable Senator Giguère, for the second reading of the Bill C-41, intituled: "An Act to implement a treaty between Canada and the United States relating to the Skagit River and Ross Lake, and the Seven Mile Reservoir on the Pend d'Oreille River".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I did not attend the sitting of the Senate yesterday for professional reasons and I was told this afternoon that I had to answer Senator Steuart's brilliant intervention. I referred to the bill and told myself that for once there was nothing very controversial in Senator Steuart's comments. They usually give rise to objections—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): This is provocative.

Senator Asselin: Sometimes, it is. When I read the title of the bill, I asked myself how I would get through this.

It is a piece of legislation to implement a treaty concluded between Canada and the United States about the Skagit River—I do not even know how to pronounce the name of the river—as well as Ross Lake, the Seven Mile Reservoir on the Pend d'Oreille River.

I learned those new names only when I read the title of the bill introduced by Senator Steuart.

As Senator Flynn has said on many occasions, the opposition is broadminded when the bills are not controversial. When reasonable bills are introduced, the opposition is always ready to agree with the government that the bill is sensible. Bill C-41 introduced by Senator Steuart yesterday evening cannot be challenged and should be passed.

However, Senator Steuart explained to us the difficulties, as stated in the other place, that our fellow citizens in British Columbia experienced before they found the solution contained in that bill.

We have been told that this dispute between part of the United States, British Columbia and Canada has been going on since 1942. It was as a result of the representations made by British Columbia politicians and groups of citizens that the project was saved and that it will finally go forward after about forty years.

I believe that this bill shows that we can succeed when the federal and provincial governments decide to agree to undertake major projects in which their common interest is at stake.

This bill includes an agreement between the Province of British Columbia and the City of Seattle in the United States; it also includes an agreement between the United States and Canada and one between Canada and British Columbia. It has been agreed that British Columbia will be allowed to export electric power to Seattle in the United States for a period of eighty years. This will provide a substantial income for British Columbia and contribute to the development of our natural resources in Canada.

If the federal government would show the same willingness towards Newfoundland and towards the other Canadian provinces when they want to sign agreements with Ottawa on such matters, it could be possible to do so where oil and offshore resources are concerned, for instance. If the federal government would show some goodwill, the problem with Newfoundland could have been solved a long time ago.

Newfoundland should refer the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the example contained in Bill C-41 as concerns the agreements signed by Canada and British Columbia to develop the hydro-electric resources of the province.

I do not think that there is any need to refer this bill to a committee. We should congratulate the government and citizens of British Columbia as well as the federal government and the American administration for having finally reached an agreement which is attractive both for Canada and British Columbia. On this side, we are willing to give second reading to this bill whenever the government is ready to propose it.

[English]

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators—

• (2010)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform honourable senators that if Senator Steuart speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I am certainly pleased that Senator Asselin, speaking for the opposition, has agreed that this bill is worthwhile supporting.

Like many others, I remember when the outburst came in British Columbia during the middle 1940s and into the '50s and '60s. I could not understand then and still cannot understand why the International Joint Commission ever allowed an order to the City of Seattle to raise the dam and, thus, threaten that very lovely valley out there.

I think this is an eminently sensible solution. Certainly, as you say, it is a good example of the federal government, the provincial government, the Government of the United States and the City of Seattle working together. I am pleased that it will receive support from both sides of the chamber.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Steuart: I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ASIA-PACIFIC FOUNDATION OF CANADA BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Steuart, seconded by the Honourable Senator Sinclair, for the second reading of the Bill C-42, intitled: "An Act to establish the Asia-Pacific Foundation of Canada".—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Macquarrie.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, Senator Macdonald is a man of great wisdom and understanding, but he may have placed all of that in jeopardy this evening by indicating that I should take his place on this matter.

I am pleased and honoured to be asked by my party—and it is not often my party asks me to speak on its behalf—to speak on Bill C-42. I have listened to Senator Steuart, a man whom I admire. He is a feisty, brittle man for whom I have great regard, but I think my leader, Senator Flynn, is much wiser than even his best friends note. He was very clever in asking a man from the region of the Atlantic Ocean to speak on a matter which deals specifically with the region of the Pacific Ocean. I am honoured to accept his designation.

I think it would be bad—and I am sure Senator Steuart will agree with me on this—to regard this piece of legislation as a regional measure, to say that it is a matter of concern only to the west coast and not of concern to those parts of Canada which may be less nobly endowed economically. In other words, the portion of Canada east of British Columbia.

Even at their worst—and I think Senator Steuart will agree with this—thoughtful Canadians know that we are not a one-ocean country, otherwise why would we have adopted the motto: A mari usque ad mare? We know damn well what sea they mean, the Pacific. The great energizing activity of our country was to move to the great Pacific Ocean. There was a quotation made by Laurier more than once that I am sure was inscribed on the old Parliament Buildings before they burned down in 1916. I have asked various researchers to verify that quotation, but no one has yet given me an answer. That quotation was as follows:

The wholesome seas are at her gates,

Her gates both East and West.

I am from the Atlantic, and I thank our leader for choosing me to state this, that if we are thoughtful and decent Canadians, we think of the eastern door and the western door, and neither one is inferior to the other. This is why I am very happy to be participating, very briefly, in this debate.

● (2020)

I am not saying that the Pacific interest should be our greatest priority. However, I believe that in the last 20 years—and when you are my age, 20 years is a very short time—the Canadian parliamentarians who have thought of the west were, in my judgment, the leaders in this field. When I was in the House of Commons, where I laboured and struggled and did not get all that far, I remember people like Arthur Laing and that wonderful man, David Goose, who were always eloquent and stalwart advocates in presenting their priority, which was for western Canada. However, before I knew these men, I was taught by other Canadians, one of whom was the Honourable Howard Green, a magnificent Canadian who had a great feel for, and a consanguinous relationship with, the province of British Columbia. He always taught us that Captain Quadra was at least as important as Jacques Cartier. There were others, such as the great George Pearkes, V.C., whose death we noted with great sympathy just a few days ago, and E. Davie Fulton.

I remember being a Conservative from the east coast, where they did not block out the Tories totally as they did in other parts of the country, and when we came up to national meetings we found that there were three great people there: George Pearkes, Howard Green and E. Davie Fulton. Howard Green never let us forget for a moment that the Pacific was the place where Canada should make its outlook, and as I read the bill today, honourable senators, in this year, 1984, I cannot help but notice—and I am not partisan at all, as all my people know—that there is nothing in that bill or in the preamble thereto that the Honourable Howard Green had not told us many times, and told the House of Commons, that this country of ours stretched a mari usque ad mare—from sea to sea—and that we should not for a moment think that the Atlantic Ocean was the only thing that mattered. Howard Green told us time and time again that we were a great Pacific country. He elaborated upon that and he suggested and he organized, and as an Atlantic Canadian, I was so proud of him and learned so much from him and am glad that, at this stage of the game, we have at last learned this lesson.

On matters of this kind I see that in the other house they say, "We must pass it quickly." My good friend, Senator Steuart, has also said that we should pass it quickly in this house. That is fine. We always have to pass things quickly in the Senate. We have heard that for a hundred years and, although I have not been around that long, I have read the record. However, I have a passing remonstrance, as they would say in the days of Charles II; a passing remonstrance that, if it was all that important, why was it not put forward three months ago? I am all for it. I think it is a great thing, but it had to be passed quickly. Could it not have been put forward earlier? I do not know if anyone in my beloved party is against this measure, but I am supportive of all its provisions.

My first introduction to this important aspect of Canada and the Pacific Rim came in two stages. The Senate committee conducted very careful and serious studies on this matter. I am surprised that no one in the other place or this place has mentioned what the Senate committee suggested. A careful reading or even a casual reading of what the Senate committee suggested in reference to Canada and the Pacific Rim would be very revealing. I am not even sure, considering what Mr. Pepin said in the other place, that he had read those things.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure he didn't.

Senator Macquarrie: My leader says he is sure he didn't, and I am not arguing with my leader. I have known my leader for many years, and I argue with a lot of people, including my wife once in a while, but usually my leader is right. The Senate committee studied this very carefully and I cannot understand why the Senate did not take cognizance of this. I wonder why the Leader of the Government did not think of that and why my brilliant friend, the deputy leader, did not think of that, because the Senate was away ahead of this, and perhaps it would have been feasible and decent to say to Mr. Pepin, for whom I have the greatest regard, that the Senate had come through this seven years previously and then come up with suggestions. I am not one who dwells on the past. I suppose that at my age the past is too long and the future is too short. All I am saying is that we are going to do our best on this. I was not present in the chamber last evening, but I would like to have heard Senator Steuart, who is a man whom I appreciate very much. He is receptive and sharp—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Not always.

Senator Macquarrie: —and he is more independent than a lot of Grits are, but I suppose that happens when you live in Saskatchewan. What else can you be? I am not going to waste the time of this honourable house by saying that it is an old, old story when they, in the other place, say get this bill passed quickly.

A year ago I quoted Arthur Meighen, who was the greatest man who ever adorned this house, but now I am going to quote a Grit who was a brilliant senator and magnificent man. In 1869 Senator John Sewall Sanborn said:

[Senator Macquarrie.]

This is a very utilitarian age, and while appointed we need to make sure of our ground and maintain that standing and respect before the country which our position demands, and which as the second House of Parliament we ought to take . . . and not let legislation pass merely as a matter of course. If it passes with our approval, it ought to pass with our intelligent approval.

Honourable senators, we really are not capable of giving our intelligent approval in a matter of half an hour even with a brilliant speech by Senator Macquarrie. I protest against this pressure-cooker attitude whereby the people in the other place will throw upon us all these measures. Honourable senators, this is, however, one of the least objectionable measures that has gone through that has been put under forced draft.

● (2030)

I don't know, and Arthur Meighen didn't know, how we will ever stop having legislation dumped upon us by the House of Commons in the last three or four days of a session. However, having in mind the heritage of Howard Green, Robert Wenman and other distinguished people from British Columbia, I am prepared to support this measure. We should look to the Pacific and make our relationships meaningful there.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: For the record, honourable senators, would my friend from Prince Edward Island identify the senator from whose 1869 speech he quoted?

Senator Steuart: Is it Senator Flynn?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Yes.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Steuart speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, Bill C-42 creating the Asia-Pacific Foundation is on the verge of passing the Senate. I agree with Senator Macquarrie that this bill, creating this foundation, is not just something that concerns western Canada or, indeed, British Columbia. If this foundation lives up to its expectations, and we have every reason to believe it will, it will be good for all of Canada.

I also think that Senator Macquarrie, very properly, referred to many great Canadians from the west coast, such as George Pearkes, Howard Green and Arthur Laing. However, he could have mentioned our own senator, Senator Perrault, and many other senators including the members of the Senate committee who, for many years, have done their best to bring the potential and the importance of the Pacific Rim not only to the attention of the Senate but to the attention of other places as well. Thank God that somebody finally listened to those people, those pioneers, and we are now doing something about it.

Again I am pleased that this bill will obviously receive the support of both sides of the Senate and, while I know that all of us agree with Senator Macquarrie that we do not like to be shoved around and pushed, when you look at the dates contained in this bill, you will see that there is some reason for passing it with reasonable dispatch. I hope it will receive full support.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Steuart: I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. C. William Doody moved the second reading of Bill C-241, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving second reading of this private member's bill, I should like to give you a little background. The honourable member for Western Arctic, who introduced this bill in the other place, asked me to sponsor it in this chamber in the absence of Senators Lucier and Adams, both of whom have more than a passing interest in it. Both these honourable colleagues of ours are in Calgary on Senate business on the Energy Committee. Therefore, I take pleasure in bringing it to your attention here in this chamber.

The bill is a very simple one. Those of us who have ever had any previous experience in government of any shape or size are always very nervous about simple bills that are supposed to be housekeeping measures. It was first thought that this bill might go through the Senate as it did the House of Commons with first and second readings, the committee stage, and third reading in just one sitting. Obviously, the bill had the full support of all parties. Perhaps, as we go through the various stages in this chamber, honourable senators will decide how they wish to proceed in dealing with this legislation.

The problem in the Arctic and in the Yukon arises as a result of the federal ownership of most of the land which, in effect, is crown land. Under the Senate and House of Commons Act, members of Parliament are not allowed to buy these crown lands. The member for Western Arctic had a particularly difficult experience in that he had been a claim-staking mineral explorer who had claim-staked a number of lots in the Arctic before he entered public life. His time period for claiming these lands has now expired. Under subsection 20(1) of the Senate and House of Commons Act, he is not allowed to take possession of them. Therefore, this private member's bill was introduced.

It was said that the amendment which is being sought affected only the three members of the House of Commons and the two senators from the Northwest Territories. It occurs to me, however, that that principle might be extended to a lot of crown lands in many parts of this country. I am thinking of Labrador and parts of the Island of Newfoundland where there are huge tracts of crown land, some of which have been passed out for summer cottage lots. I do not think the question of whether they were being purchased by a member of Parliament or by a member of any other public body, commission or crown agency ever arose.

Over some time, this has been brought to the attention of the House of Commons, and consequently this bill was introduced a day or so ago. It received the support of all three parties.

The amendment is very simple. The subsection to which I refer now reads:

20.(1) In every contract, agreement or commission to be made, entered into or accepted by any person with the Government of Canada or any of the departments or officers of the Government of Canada, there shall be inserted an express condition that no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract, agreement or commission, or to any benefit to arise therefrom.

It is proposed that the subsection should read as follows:

20.(1) In every contract, agreement or commission to be made, entered into or accepted by any person with the Government of Canada or any of the departments or officers of the Government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada is to be paid, there shall be inserted an express condition that no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract, agreement or commission, or to any benefit to arise therefrom.

As I say, honourable senators, the intent of the bill is obvious. There is no pecuniary advantage to these members of Parliament in obtaining crown land leased for a summer cottage or for any other purpose.

I would commend the bill to you for second reading.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the sponsor of this bill. I note that this matter is confined to members of the House of Commons. I do not see why it should not include members of Parliament, in other words, senators as well as members of the House of Commons. Could he explain that to us?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, Senator Molson was kind enough to mention his concern to me before I stood up, and that is why I included in my preamble that none of these housekeeping and very simple pieces of legislation is without peril. It is absolutely true that the amendment states:

—there shall be inserted an express condition that no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share—

It does not say anything about the Senate. I can only assume that the people who drafted the legislation felt that there were no such venal or vulgar people in the Senate who would take advantage of an opportunity to profit from doing business with the Crown.

● (2040)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the section that is being amended does not refer to the Senate either.

Senator Doody: I see; there is another section in there, then, that does. I can only suggest to Senator Molson that, if this bill does go to committee, then that aspect could be examined. Quite obviously, however, the wording herein does not mention the Senate. If there is another section in this act that does, then obviously the situation is taken care of. In that case, however, that section should also be changed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that this bill deals with the original proposition; in other words, the amendment would cover that which was contained in the original act which does not refer to senators either. The amendment applies to members of the House of Commons only because the section in the original act applies to the members of the House of Commons.

Senator Molson: Will this matter then be left in such a way that senators could benefit from these contracts?

Senator Frith: The section in the original act did not apply to senators.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): How do you know?

Senator Molson: I think we ought to know. It seems to me that there is no particular reason to pick on the members of the House of Commons without including the senators. I would be glad to move an amendment to this bill, if that is necessary.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the proposed amendment deals with section 20 of the act, and it reads:

20.(1) In every contract, agreement or commission to be made, entered into or accepted by any person with the Government of Canada or any of the departments or officers of the Government of Canada . . . there shall be inserted an express condition that no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract, agreement or commission, or to any benefit to arise therefrom.

It can be seen that in the original legislation there was no such limitation placed on senators. Therefore, when the amendment came along to make the legislation less restrictive, it only applied to members of the House of Commons.

Senator Doody: I suppose the answer is that the original drafter of the bill knew that senators could never get involved in such a situation.

Senator Frith: Perhaps.

Senator Doody: The original concept of the Senate was one of a group of gentlemen who would not consent to this sort of thing, in any event.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, if this bill goes to committee and the matter is thus straightened out, I have no objection. Otherwise, I will move an amendment. Will the bill go to committee?

Senator Frith: I think not. Honourable senators, section 20 of the act says that no member of the House of Commons shall do X. The amendment says that, in spite of that, the members of the House of Commons can do Y. The restriction that now applies to members of the House of Commons does not, therefore, apply to senators. There is no reason to include senators as an exception to something that did not apply to them in the first place.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: If they were never in, you don't have to take them out.

Senator Frith: That's it; I should have had Senator Donahoe, the Attorney General, say it—if they were never in, you don't have to take them out.

Senator Flynn: I am not sure of that, honourable senators. I think that the amendment really changes the perspective in that there was a prohibition but now there is a restriction limited to those who provide payment. In all other contracts, a member of the House of Commons can be a party. Therefore, by stipulating that, there is laid down a principle— what is the maxim I am thinking of?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

Senator Flynn: Exactly. I knew that I would have help from a great Latinist. Thank you, Senator Hicks.

Honourable senators, I think that by saying that, a member of the House of Commons can now be a party to a contract as long as he does not provide the payment of public funds. But a senator is prohibited from doing so. Only the members of the House of Commons are permitted to do that. Although the intention may have been excellent, the effect of the amendment may not be exactly what we think it is.

I think we must commend Senator Molson for having drawn our attention to this point. I would suggest that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs look into this matter some time tomorrow and ensure that we are not making a mistake by providing for something that is exclusively in favour of the House of Commons. Here the restriction was intended for them, but if we want now to permit them to do something, I do not see why we should maintain the exception for senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have made my opinion clear. Senator Flynn and Senator Molson have their opinions. I just cannot understand why, if someone is not included in the bill, you must include him in a later amendment.

This is a private member's bill. In the other place the government has supported it. The government supports it here. If it is the wish of honourable senators to refer the bill to committee, that is fine. For the reasons explained in the other place, the government supports the bill. For the reasons I have explained tonight, it is my view that there is no need to have it amended. If, however, honourable senators feel differently, let us send it to committee.

Senator Flynn: That is fine. The last argument I can accept is that the government supports it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Do you mean the first and the last or the last?

Senator Flynn: The last argument.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Doody moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES 1984-85

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1985.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, supplementary estimates (A) constitute a relatively modest request of the government. The report of the committee was self-explanatory inasmuch as it really asks, in the main, for more funding for job creation programs. It has been suggested that there were some electioneering additions included as well, but, of course, only the cynics would suggest that.

There is little that can be said about these estimates. As I have said, they are relatively modest. I have no doubt that the government will be requesting more supply later on in the year, but, in the meantime, the less said about this particular small offering, the better.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this order is considered debated.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1984-85

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-45, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1985.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us today, Appropriation Bill No. 2, 1984-85, provides for the release of the balance of the main estimates for 1984-85 amounting to some $26.8 billion and the whole of supplementary estimates (A), 1984-85 amounting to approximately $296 million. The total spending authority requested by this bill is just over $27 billion.

Honourable senators will remember that our normal procedure with regard to appropriation bills, unlike other legislation which is often referred to committee for study, is to have the estimates referred to the Committee on National Finance for detailed study of the schedules and annexes.

The main estimates were tabled in the Senate on February 23, 1984, and were immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, as is our practice. These estimates were discussed in committee with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials on May 24, 1984.

Honourable senators will remember that the main estimates were tabled yesterday by Senator Leblanc, the Deputy Chairman of the National Finance Committee.

Supplementary estimates (A) were tabled in the Senate on May 22, 1984, and, again, as is our practice, were immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Officials of the Treasury Board Secretariat discussed the estimates with the committee on May 29, 1984. Those estimates were reported yesterday and spoken to a moment ago by the chairman of the committee, Senator Doody.

Honourable senators, although the schedules tell us about the estimates which were referred and which form part of the bill, they do not contain some information as to supply to date. Therefore, I ask leave to place two tables on the record as part of my speech on second reading.

The first table is entitled "Estimates Tabled to Date for 1984-85". It shows the budgetary and non-budgetary items, divided into those to be voted and those which are statutory. With regard to the main estimates, the total of budgetary and non-budgetary items to be voted is $37,151,673,399. The statutory portion is $59,372,049,919. The two figures together total $96,523,723,318.

The second table is entitled "Supply to Date for 1984-85". This table sets out the amount of supply which has already been approved to date with respect to Appropriation Act No. 1, 1984-85, and is called interim supply. The total there is $10,358,774,745.49. The amount awaiting approval is the balance of the main estimates, which is $26,792,898,653.51 and the whole of supplementary estimates (A).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The tables follow:)

Honourable senators, I ask for support on second reading.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES OF CANADA

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Aboriginal Peoples of Canada;

That the Committee be composed of eight Senators;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order stands in the name of Senator Roblin. I asked Senator Flynn if he had had an opportunity to discuss this matter with Senator Roblin. I believe he said that the debate could continue on Wednesday. However, perhaps I am being premature in saying that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I did not have a chance to speak to Senator Roblin. I would not dare to presume with respect to his decision on this matter.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, neither would I. Order stands.

PARLIAMENT

DESIGNATION OF SENATORS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege which follows from discussions which have gone on in this chamber prior to tonight.

Over the last 15 to 20 years, I have been watching the growing abuse of the word "Parliament". Communications from government officials and from cabinet ministers are addressed to "Members of Parliament and Senators". I know that I am harking back to constitutional principles about which I am afraid most parliamentarians today are ignorant. That is to say, Parliament is one body. It is composed of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. The term "members of Parliament" applies to the whole grouping.

I have been wondering over these many years whether the differentiation between members of Parliament, meaning members of the House of Commons, and members of the Senate, is being deliberately promoted in an attempt to produce a division and a separation of the concept of one Parliament. I do not know about that, but I know that it has become a prevalent practice today.

The use of the term is wrong in terms of constitutional law, constitutional history and parliamentary usage. Therefore, I would like to take this opportunity to raise the matter before the Senate tonight. I am really not too concerned about the nomenclature. What I am concerned about is how ignorant members of Parliament—and that includes the members of both houses—are of our constitutional background, and how prepared we are to disregard it in terms of our usage of language.

● (2100)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Flynn and other senators know that some time ago—approximately four years ago—I recognized what Senator Lang has referred to this evening. I agree with him completely that section 17 of the B.N.A. Act—which, of course, was our Constitution—still forms part of our Constitution and describes exactly what Senator Lang has pointed out, namely, that Parliament is one body. If one is a member of Parliament, one can be a member of the House of Commons or of the Senate. There are three parts. Therefore it is the wrong nomenclature that is applied. If we are going to refer to members of the House of Commons, then it is correct to refer in the same thought to members of the Senate. If one is referring to members of Parliament, no further description is necessary, because members of both houses are members of Parliament.

Therefore I wish the honourable senator well in raising the matter as a question of privilege this evening. It will probably take time to correct the view that there is some difference as between members of Parliament and senators, or that members of the Senate are not also members of Parliament.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Did you ever raise the question in cabinet?

Senator Olson: I have done that a number of times, although the members of the cabinet, of which I am a member, were not confused; they already knew. As a matter of fact, I had business cards printed with “H. A. Olson, PC, MP” because it is perfectly legal and correct to do that.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to add a dimension to the problem, in the first place, I agree with Senator Olson and Senator Lang that, on the basis for the point of privilege, they are quite correct. I do not believe that anyone would argue that the Queen, the senators and members of the House of Commons constitute Parliament. However, I do believe there is an indication in this country—which is a bilingual country, certainly for the purpose of our Constitution—that the problem might very well be one of correcting the usage; because, of course, the same problem does not exist in French, because the members of the other place are not called membres du Parlement; they are called Députés. So the distinction is maintained in the sense that they are not called members of a whole but are members of a place. I would certainly encourage honourable senators to pursue the reversal of the usage and make it clear that members of the other place are members of the House of Commons, that we are senators, and that Parliament consists of all three, namely, the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons.

Although I make that suggestion, it seems to me that we have to find in English a word that distinguishes more clearly a member of the other place. It seems to me that the most obvious term is “HC”, member of the House of Commons.

I do not know where exactly we can take this, but I hope that Senator Lang will accept that many of us support his view and would like to find a solution to the problem, which, I believe, has grown up largely as a question of misuse of a particular term.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to thank the Honourable Senator Lang for bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

WORLD WAR II

D-DAY—FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF INVASION OF EUROPE BY ALLIED FORCES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of the Normandy offensive, known as D-Day, June 6, 1944, I should like to join with the representatives of this chamber who are accompanying the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs at the events in France in commemorating this historic event which led to the final victory of World War II, which was started by the invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, by Hitler's forces of Nazi Germany.

For us in this chamber the pictures on the walls depicting the scenes of World War I are a constant reminder. World War I also took place on many a battlefield of France as did the battles of World War II and the Normandy offensive.

Today we pay solemn tribute to the thousands of allied soldiers, airmen and sailors who made the supreme sacrifice of giving their lives in defence of freedom and democracy. Today, particularly, we recall with pride and gratitude the sacrifice of the 15,000 Canadians who fought on the beaches of Normandy. By the end of June 6, 1944, more than 1,000 Canadians had been killed or were missing in action. This invasion ultimately cost the lives of 24,000 allied soldiers, including 5,400 Canadians. These Canadians, who are buried in Normandy, were young men who were denied the opportunity of returning home to share in our freedom and prosperity.

Taking part in this great offensive called D-Day were over 155,000 allied forces, among them 15,000 Canadians. In that force were members of the Polish air force, covering the invasion, and Commander Romuald Nalecz-Tyminski of the Polish navy, who also took some of those soldiers to the shores of Normandy.

These forces were soon followed by General Stanislaw Maczek with his First Polish Armoured Division fighting under the command of General Guy Simmonds of the Second Corps of the First Canadian Army. Many of these Polish veterans are today in Canada and will be commemorating their victorious major battle of Chambois, culminating in the decisive victory at Falaise.

We also recall, with gratitude and pride, the First Polish Parachute Brigade and its gallant battle at Arnheim, Holland. Today we also recall the heroic death of a young Polish Canadian from Winnipeg, Pilot Officer Andrew Mynarski, who displayed bravery of the highest order trying to save his tail gunner when their aircraft was downed over the French soil of Cambrai on June 12, 1944, for which he was posthumously awarded the Victoria Cross.

I recall these facts today for the record, and to remind honourable senators here today, and those who are not, of the military feats and contributions of Canadians of many ethnic origins. Many of these Canadians, choosing western democracy over communism, did not return to their native lands after the final victory over Hitler's forces because their native countries were occupied by another foreign and hostile power, following grave political and tactical mistakes of certain allied leaders. Today we have a fragile peace—we have a cold war but we do have peace. We have this peace thanks also to the foresight and sacrifice of the western democratic countries which banded together to form the North Atlantic Alliance.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization was founded 35 years ago as a voluntary defensive alliance of 16 sovereign and democratic nations, including Canada. It has presided over the longest period of peace in modern Europe. Canada, with its NATO allies, must continue to support and strengthen this alliance so as to be ever strong, vigilant and prepared to deter an enemy attack. This will require political wisdom and sacrifice on our part.

Last month I had the privilege of attending the spring session of the North Atlantic Assembly in Luxembourg, where it was gratifying to hear the resolve to strengthen NATO and to strive for peace with freedom. Honourable senators, it is this peace with freedom that our soldiers, airmen and sailors fought and died for. Let us make the necessary sacrifice and wise decisions to preserve it for ourselves and for posterity. In doing this, our gallant dead will truly be honoured and remembered.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may, I will take half a minute or so to recognize, on behalf of the government, the fortieth anniversary of the massive operations that took place on the beaches and soil of Normandy. It is well that we remember today what happened at that time. However, I think that this year, in particular, there is a growing rather than a diminishing appreciation on the part of Canadians of the participation of the Canadian forces in that massive operation. I think it is important for us to remember with greater rather than diminishing appreciation the enormous effort that was made by the people of a country like Canada.

Honourable senators, rather than adding a lot of words, perhaps it would be appropriate that we stand for a moment of silence out of respect for the enormous achievement that was made then.

Whereupon the senators rose and stood in silent tribute.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: We shall remember them.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

KAHO'OLAWE ISLAND—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN ARMAMENT TESTING

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government concerning a report about Canadian naval participation in the bombing of Kaho'olawe Island in the Hawaiian area. That island has for a long time been used for the testing of armaments. Both houses of the Hawaiian Legislature have asked that the testing be stopped, and Canada in particular, since Canada is one of the two remaining participants in the operation, is being approached by an environmental group.

Can the minister tell us what is the present reaction of the Canadian government? Can he also say whether Mr. Fairbanks, the spokesman of the group—who came to British Columbia because it is a Pacific Rim operation, and supposedly will be coming to Ottawa this week—has met with government officials, and whether there is a likelihood of a committee or informal group of the Senate being given the opportunity to hear the concerns of this man, who is very distressed, as are many people in that area concerning the environmental damage to the island, which is interesting and valuable in terms of archaeology and flora?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in reply to the latter part of the question, I do not know whether or not the gentleman in question has met with any officials of the federal government or, in particular, the Department of National Defence.

With regard to the general question, I will make some inquiries and will obtain more specific information. I was aware of publicity being given to the views that have been expressed by Senator Macquarrie who, I believe, should bear in mind that the Canadian Forces who are participating in training exercises are there, if not at the invitation, then certainly with the concurrence of the Defense Department of the United States, with all of the implications which follow from that.

Possibly the Department of Defense in the United States, and others, have looked into these matters. I am not sure whether or not it is the case, but apparently they do not agree with the representations that have been made. Whether Canada should be involved in a determination of the validity of the claims is really a question that I would like to refer to the Department of External Affairs before attempting to give a definitive answer.

Senator Macquarrie: I appreciate the minister's reply and will await further information. It is interesting to note that Australia, New Zealand and Japan used to be involved but have decided to withdraw from the exercise.

Senator Olson: I am aware of that but it may not be for the reasons put forward in the early part of the question.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday, June 13, 1984, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay moved the third reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY TREATY IMPLEMENTATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Steuart, moved third reading of Bill C-41, to implement a treaty between Canada and the United States relating to the Skagit River and Ross Lake, and the Seven Mile Reservoir on the Pend d'Oreille River.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ASIA-PACIFIC FOUNDATION OF CANADA BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Steuart, moved third reading of Bill C-42, to establish the Asia-Pacific Foundation of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved the third reading of Bill C-12, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977.

He said: Honourable senators, I do not think it is necessary for me to make any extended remarks at this stage other than to—

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I do not have any objection to Senator Hicks making some remarks at this stage. I understand that according to our rules, it would not automatically bring the debate to an end.

[English]

Senator Hicks: Mr. Speaker, I am not closing the debate, I am simply moving third reading and speaking to the motion I just made.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is right, that is what we are saying.

Hon. Martial Asselin: If you want to do it, then go ahead.

Senator Flynn: No one is contesting that.

Senator Hicks: I am sorry, honourable senators, I did not hear what Senator Tremblay said because my ear-piece had become disconnected from the sound system. My honourable friends know that they have every right to debate this motion for as long as they like; and I am quite prepared to have them do so.

Honourable senators, all I wished to do was to thank those who participated in the debate. I am sorry that I missed some of the contributions to the debate, particularly those by Senators Tremblay and Murray who followed Senator Kelly. I have read their speeches in Hansard. I thought they presented their points of view very well indeed. As they know from some of the sentiments I personally have expressed, I have every sympathy with some of the positions they have taken, although after careful consideration I came to a conclusion that was different from theirs with respect to the disposition of this bill.

I think that is all that I need say at this time. I hope that honourable senators will support the third reading and passage of this legislation.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, there are two things here which I find regrettable.

First of all, I regret that Senator Hicks found it necessary to reach a conclusion before the debate on third reading. We on this side may be excused for having nurtured some idle hopes that comments expressing our point of view might influence the conclusion Senator Hicks might draw from this debate. However, although he has already made his conclusion, we shall nevertheless do our duty.

I shall add a second regret, more or less in the same vein as the first one, namely that the Committee on National Finance did not find it necessary to invite the minister or ministers responsible for developing and implementing Bill C-12. I feel that if we had been able to hear what these ministers had to say, we would have been able to clarify certain points on which there has been some confusion.

I am thinking, for instance, of what was said about the interpretation of at least one part of Bill C-12, the part that deals with fiscal arrangements. We all know that in the first few months of 1977—that is, towards the end of the fiscal year, since the new year started in April 1977—there was a major change in the procedures for federal contributions to established programs financing for health, with two specific programs, and post-secondary education.

This major change involved making a very clear distinction between a tax transfer and maintaining direct subsidies—considering that in previous years, starting in 1967, it had been agreed that the federal government would contribute 50 per cent of operating expenditures for post-secondary education.

There may be some aspects that need clarification but that is not the main thing. When it was found that in 1975-76, expenditures for the two sectors combined represented “x” dollars, it was then decided that part of these expenditures would be financed through tax transfers. If I remember correctly, and I do not guarantee the accuracy of my figures, the tax transfer was based on a precedent, namely that Quebec had already disposed of 4.354 personal and corporate income tax points and had already taken advantage of the opting-out clause for health and post-secondary education programs.

On the basis of this precedent, the provinces were given more flexibility for collecting their own revenue for the purposes mentioned. It started as a transfer of 13.5 personal income tax points and one corporate tax point. These tax points were subject to equalization. Well, I feel that this part of the 1977 operation cannot be seen otherwise than as a part of the tax transfer system, tax transfers in terms of tax points and equalization payments.

In fact, here was a principle being applied before it got the name and was laid down in the Constitution Act of 1982, and this was done because there was justification for doing so on the basis of previous experience.

Perhaps it would be worthwhile to read the relevant passage of the Constitution Act, 1982, to understand the intent of this transfer operation that took place in 1977 with respect to the programs I just mentioned.

Section 36(1) notes the general objectives of equalization and reducing regional disparities, and subsection 36(2) says exactly what is involved.

Parliament and the government of Canada are committed to the principle of making equalization payments to ensure that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services . . .

Including health and post-secondary education, of course—
 . . . at reasonably comparable levels of taxation.

In the case of an equalized tax transfer, the intent is to ensure that the provinces have the revenue they need to provide services at levels of taxation that are reasonably comparable between provinces. That is what equalization means. Equalization payments are meant to correct the regional disparities that are not corrected by a straightforward tax transfer. Cash payments were added to that transfer, which amounted to about 50 per cent of expenditures incurred in those two fields in 1975, 1976 and 1977, because it had been systematically provided that equalization would not cover total expenditures, but 50 per cent.

● (1430)

I remember very well the discussions at that time, and because I was there I can say that the federal ministers involved were quite clear. The federal government said "We want to keep a margin". At the same time, the provinces, of course, thought that the tax transfer should amount to the full 50 per cent. The federal government said no to a unilateral tax transfer.

The federal government was then bragging about its open-mindedness and saying that the provinces would end up with a much wider margin of operation with respect to their taxing autonomy and to equalization. Ottawa was intent on having a margin of operation which eventually led to direct grants.

I strongly suggest that this bill should indeed only deal with direct grants, but I have the impression that the 6 and 5 per cent ceiling on the growth of federal contributions for 1983-84 and 1984-85 will apply to all equalization payments, including tax transfers and direct grants.

That is one of the major issues I would have raised in committee and which I am raising this afternoon with Senator Hicks or whoever might enlighten me in that respect. Am I reading the bill correctly, and will the 6 and 5 per cent ceiling on the growth rate apply to tax transfers as well as to direct grants?

If I read the bill correctly, we are facing an extremely significant precedent the likes of which we have never seen in the entire history of the federation. Although tax transfers, or more precisely the tax sharing agreement is part and parcel of the overall equalization formula, growth will be limited through a unilaterally imposed percentage factor. On the contrary, it is the growth of the overall yield of the tax base which is the rule.

My question therefore is very precise: Will the 6 and 5 per cent ceiling apply to the entire federal contribution, namely the transfer of the 13 tax points with equalization and the tax point concerning individual taxpayers and direct grants, or only to direct grants?

If the answer to that question is yes, I think we are taking a very serious step whose future impact we ought to be fully aware of. Why be satisfied with tax transfers when it could be applied to the whole sharing formula between the two government levels?

This is a good time to raise one point. Throughout our discussions, some people gave the impression that we were talking about federal funds. That may be so with respect to direct grants, but we cannot say that federal funds are involved in tax transfers. Otherwise, we would have to speak in terms of federal funds every time the federal government agrees not to levy 100 per cent of personal income taxes or 100 per cent of corporate taxes.

Everyone knows that this debate has been going on since the early days of Confederation and that the problem was finally solved with what are usually called the fiscal arrangements. There was even a time when the federal government was not involved in these taxation fields. In fact, during the last war the legislation which allowed the federal government to collect just about all personal income tax was known as the Tax Rental Act. At that time, the federal government recognized in the very name it gave its legislation that it was renting a taxation field from the provinces.

Obviously, it is inappropriate to speak about federal funds when referring to the sharing of tax revenue, even though we have been doing it since 1977. This is my major point about this matter.

I now come to another aspect which was discussed extensively in the committee yesterday in relation to the submission made by the Chairman of the Canadian Council of Education Ministers, namely the national objectives mentioned in section 9.

Mr. Donahoe provided us with some information we did not have before. We had a few indications of this through some of the statements made by the Secretary of State, for instance when he said, as reported in Le Devoir, that the federal government, when they inserted this section—specifically the concept of national objectives—intended to negotiate the matter with the provinces. If the negotiations did not succeed, they would legislate to define national objectives for post-secondary education.

We learned yesterday that the Secretary of State has indeed referred to four objectives in his discussions with his provincial counterparts, the Ministers of Education, namely mobility, accessibility, accountability or invisibility—it is not certain which—and finally, bilingualism and teaching programs in the minority language or programs for teaching the minority language.

I would remind you, honourable senators, that on this last point, as emphasized by the Chairman of the Council of Education Ministers yesterday, the system seems to be working satisfactorily on both sides since I have before me a paper entitled “Memorandum of agreement between the Government of Canada and the Provincial Governments with respect to Teaching in the Minority Language and to Teaching the Second Language”. This paper is of recent date. For the information of honourable senators, I would add that even Quebec and Ottawa have agreed on this matter.

I read in the June 4 issue of La Presse that Ottawa and Quebec are agreeing on the financing of education for the minorities, which means agreeing on the signing of a specific agreement to extend the general agreement which provides the major co-ordinates for such agreements.

This was one of the objectives that the Secretary of State wanted to enshrine in federal legislation. I do not see the need for it since memorandums of agreement have been signed.

I noted from what the Chairman of the Council of Education Ministers said yesterday that the situation is the same for the four other points. This is true unless we are thinking of questions like those which Senator Thériault asked yesterday about accessibility. He asked Mr. Donahoe something like this: “Can I be assured that there never will be a young student with the necessary talent not being able to pursue a post-secondary education for lack of financial resources?” That was the thrust of his question, whether the federal minister using some sort of technique or formula would allow a reply to the question asked by Senator Thériault saying that there is a guarantee that no child with the necessary talent will be prevented from having access to post-secondary education. After all we should not ask such naïve questions. The educational systems throughout Canada have been aware of this fact for a long time.

Everyone knows that there is always a difference between what we could call ideal post-secondary attendance rates and the actual rates. Why is that? If someone could give me sound scientific reasons for this difference, it would be of service not only to Canada, but to all of mankind. All education systems are wondering about this.

Let us deal with only one aspect of the issue. Some sort of motivation is needed to continue one's education. If you analyze the motivation of young people, you will find inaccessible factors. We cannot correct them. For all practical purposes, financial assistance is available to all those who are eager to invest in their own education. Of course, there might be marginal cases. I did say “who are eager to invest in their own education”. If we do not accept this proviso, what Senator Thériault really means is free access to post-secondary education for all. That is the issue. Whether through an immediate contribution by way of tuition fees or a loan, that is, immediate accessibility against the reimbursement of the loan at a later date, which serves to establish a point. When dealing with mobility or accessibility, we must realize that, unless this is wishful thinking, we should not meddle with legislation such as this, unless we are willing really to get involved in the administration of educational systems.

It is then that fundamental questions are raised. They would probably not be raised if clause 9 as drafted did not really mean what it says. It is formulated in such a way, and both the Minister and Secretary of State expressed themselves in such terms that we are faced with a decision which opens the door to further legislative intrusions by the federal government in an area of clearly provincial responsibility, one which has been recognized ever since the early days of Confederation.

These are the points I wanted to make this afternoon and which, in my opinion, should be examined very closely. Unless Senator Hicks provides me with very satisfactory answers when he rises to speak again, I do not think I could open the door to such an uncertain and quarrelsome future.

[English]

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I want to begin by stating how very much I deplore the way in which this bill has been handled by the government leadership in the Senate. During the debate on second reading, a little while ago, there were speeches on this side of the chamber by Senators Kelly, Roblin, Tremblay and myself in which certain questions were raised and concerns expressed.

● (1440)

We believed that those questions and concerns would be addressed when the bill went to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance which met yesterday afternoon. We heard from the Honourable Terence R. Donahoe, Minister of Education for Nova Scotia, and the Honourable Lynn Verge, Minister of Education for Newfoundland, who were representing the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada. In their turn, those witnesses raised important issues touching on this bill and on the whole field of post-secondary education in Canada.

Some of those concerns focused on clause 9 of this bill, which requires the Secretary of State to report annually on, among other things, the relationship between federal financial contributions and Canada's economic and educational goals; and to report on any consultations between the Secretary of State and the Council of Ministers of Education regarding——the definition of national purposes to be served by post-secondary education and the means by which the governments of Canada and the provinces will achieve those purposes.

That clause, which is in some ways innocuous, takes on a rather ominous and, indeed, menacing significance in light of statements made by the Secretary of State, Mr. Joyal, following passage of the bill in the House of Commons. Many of Mr. Joyal's statements were referred to previously in debate here and in committee.

I simply want to underline to honourable senators that what we are talking about here is an interpretation that Mr. Joyal has placed on a clause of this bill after the bill passed the House of Commons, an interpretation which, in my judgment, should not be justified by that clause and which most people who have read the clause and are interested in the subject would not accept as a proper interpretation. In particular, Mr. Joyal said that the section would give Ottawa what he called:

[Translation]

The right to check how the provinces use the federal funds allocated to post-secondary education.

[English]

Then, much more ominously, Mr. Joyal said, and I quote:

[Translation]

This section should ring a bell for the provinces. It should serve as an alarm signal to tell them that the federal government means business.

[English]

People want to know just why the alarm bells should be ringing or just what these warning signals are supposed to mean, because that was not, so far as anybody was aware, the intent of clause 9 when the bill passed the other place.

Yesterday afternoon we asked that the committee sit one more day. The committee had one meeting and we asked for another and for the opportunity to put some questions to the Secretary of State. That opportunity was turned down by the government majority. I say that that is a deplorable use by the government of its majority and one which is designed to frustrate the minority party in this chamber in carrying out its responsibilities.

Honourable senators, this bill has serious ramifications. I have made reference to clause 9 in terms of what it reveals or conceals about the intentions of the government in the field of post-secondary education, but there are other serious ramifications. The application of the six-and-five program reduces the transfers to the provinces by $118.5 million in 1983-84—this reduction applies retroactively—and by $260 million in 1984-85. These reductions will materially affect post-secondary institutions, universities and community colleges which are already hard pressed and which are already feeling the pinch, especially in the poorer provinces.

The Breau report—that of the Parliamentary Task Force on Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements—projected less than three years ago, I believe, that there would be continued declines in post-secondary enrolment in this country for many years to come. Less than three years later we find that enrolments are increasing by better than 5 per cent nationally in the academic year that is just drawing to a close.

On the matter of the pinch that the universities are feeling at a time when, as Mr. Donahoe pointed out yesterday, the provinces and the universities are struggling to meet new challenges presented by the changes in Canadian society, I noted that, when the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee of the House of Commons met to consider this bill, Dr. Donald Savage, the Executive Secretary of the Canadian Association of University Teachers, said this:

We believe that, at the moment, Canadian universities are seriously underfunded, that their capacity to deliver first-rate education in reasonable circumstances to their students is declining.

Dr. Savage went on to say:

We find, for instance, that even before the period in which funds began to fall off for Canadian universities, Canadian university libraries were not particularly competitive on the North American scene. For instance, the latest analysis of libraries which includes the United States and Canada indicates that Queen's University would rank eighty-fifth in North America, right in there with the University of Connecticut. You will find three campuses of the State University of New York with better library collections than Queen's; you will find a number of campuses of the University of California in the same category; and so on. Indeed, the only two Canadian universities which are in any way really competitive in an international sense are Toronto and the University of British Columbia.

Dr. Savage indicates that the provincial cutbacks taking place in British Columbia are, and I quote:

—going to knock the library of the University of British Columbia right out of that international competitive ranking.

At the same time, Dr. Andrew MacKay, the President of Dalhousie University and also the President of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, said this to the committee:

Let me speak for my own institution—and I hate to say this, but some of the things I am going to tell you I am not proud of. For example, in our chemistry department, instead of offering laboratory periods for students in normal chemistry classes as we once did, weekly, for a full afternoon or a full morning, the students in the beginning years of chemistry may get a laboratory period once every two or three weeks. In part that is because of the shortage of supplies; shortage of funds for supplies for chemistry. It is perhaps just a footnote that our costs in terms of supplies for chemical materials and chemistry equipment are higher because of federal tax implications that apply to those that once did not. But that is one of the costs we have had to meet.

That is one part of my university. The other part, the computer science—development in the program for computer science . . . the access to computers for young people in sciences and social sciences—we simply cannot keep up to the demand. We are far too limited with equipment. I am personally trying to hustle means of accomplishing goals to meet the needs of students. I do not know quite how that is going to be put together over the next two or three years. That is a major problem.

In some of our beginning classes in particular, numbers have increased beyond what my colleagues would like to see; certainly beyond the ratio we knew in the 1960s and 1970s. It is particularly difficult, for example, in language classes.

This is one of the national objectives, I may say, set out by the Secretary of State. Dr. MacKay continues:

I do not know how one—

● (1450)

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: I wonder if I might interrupt the honourable senator to ask a question relative to a point he just made.

Senator Murray: The question might be better addressed to Dr. MacKay, whom I am quoting, but I will hear it.

Senator Rowe: I believe that you mentioned, a moment ago, federal tax implications. Is there an actual tax on chemical supplies going to universities?

Senator Murray: Dr. MacKay says, in terms of supplies for chemical materials and chemistry equipment, that there is a federal tax applicable now which was not applicable in the past.

Dr. MacKay goes on to speak of language classes:

I do not know how one teaches languages well in classes that are just too big. But language classes are not the only ones that are affected.

We have had at my institution—

That is Dalhousie University in Halifax,

—in the last two years, I think, more than a hundred fewer support staff. This year or next year, I should say, we are quite likely to have fewer academic staff, though we face more students next year than we have had in the last year. In the Maritime provinces over the last four years enrolment has grown by more than 25% across the system. That is more than the equivalent of full-time enrolment at the University of New Brunswick and more than the equivalent of Dalhousie's full-time enrolment last year. We are now marginally over 8,000 students full-time. Last year we had fewer. There have been more than 8,000 full-time students in the university system in the maritime provinces over the last four years, but we have had no means of keeping up the same sort of support for their educational programs.

So says the President of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, who is also President of Dalhousie University, Dr. MacKay.

He went on to speak of the budgetary situation, and I should like to place this one paragraph on the record:

[Senator Murray.]

Let me simply stress that universities face great difficulties, and one of the difficulties that I think we face, if you look down the road beyond the next year or two, is the difficulty of planning with any feeling of certainty over more than a few years at a time. If you look back over the history of federal and provincial funding of the university system in Canada, back even to the early 1950s, there has been a change about every five years, at a maximum. That is a very short time frame for universities to plan in, when most of your programs are for a minimal of four years. In 1980 we began to go through the difficulties of federal-provincial discussions about renegotiating the EPF, and there was a great deal of uncertainty in the universities through the next two years.

We now face a situation where, apparently, we will have limited transfers to the provinces to support the kind of work we do for the two years of 1983-1984 and 1984-1985. We do not know what is on the horizon beyond the spring of 1985. I hope that it is possible for governments to agree on at least the framework for long-term planning, if post-secondary institutions, and especially universities, are to have a full opportunity to contribute to the future of this country, as we think they ought to have and as young people deserve.

This bill has serious ramifications for federal-provincial relations, because the bill, unilaterally and retroactively, changes the formula. It imposes the six-and-five ceiling for two years, but it thereby reduces the base upon which the GNP escalator will apply in succeeding years. So there are direct reductions taking place retroactively for last year and for this year, with the effect of reducing support in succeeding years.

Thirdly, the bill has serious ramifications because it purports to abandon the concept of block funding. For the first time in legislation, for the first time since block funding was introduced, the government formally separates the funding for post-secondary education and for health care. I say that the government "purports" to abandon the concept of block funding because the allocation formula settled upon and dictated by the federal government in no way binds the provinces.

As I pointed out the other day, in 1977 the agreement on block funding was for health and post-secondary education. No distinction was made as between health and post-secondary education, and the allocation formula—67.9 per cent supposedly to go to health, and 32.1 per cent supposedly to go to post-secondary education—was an afterthought on the part of the federal government. That allocation is arbitrary, it is unilateral, it is irrelevant, and it is of no effect; and it will be of no effect, I suggest, even after this bill is passed, if it passes.

The provinces are completely free to allocate these funds between health services and post-secondary education as conditions and priorities in each province warrant.

Senator Hicks has correctly stated in debate in this chamber and in committee yesterday that in so doing the provinces are doing nothing illegal. But every time he says that, he makes it sound as if what they are doing is faintly immoral or improper.

I wish to be quite clear on this. There has never been any agreement, there has never been any undertaking, there has never been any commitment, on the part of the provinces that block funding would be allocated in any particular proportions as between health and post-secondary education—not since block funding was introduced in 1977. To reproach any province for not spending 67.9 per cent of the federal transfer—or what the federal government calls its transfer—on health and 32.1 per cent on post-secondary education is totally unjust.

Our colleague, Senator Stewart of Antigonish-Guysborough, said in committee—and I trust that I am quoting him correctly—that since 1967 there had been “a sort of ground rule” that the costs would be shared 50-50 as between the federal and provincial governments. I believe that the assertion that there is “a sort of ground rule” should be placed alongside the following quotation from the report of the Parliamentary Task Force on Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements. At page 75 it says:

In assessing this question, it is helpful not to enter the discussion with too much “50-50 hindsight”. Contrary to popular belief, there was no precise 50-50 cost-sharing in health insurance or post-secondary education in any one province prior to 1977. Federal transfers to a province were based on national average costs in medical insurance, a mix of national average and provincial costs in hospital insurance, and either 50 per cent of the total post-secondary operating costs, or an escalated per capita grant ($15 in 1967) for post-secondary education. Thus, in post-secondary education, where fee income supplements provincial operating grants, the federal share of post-secondary operating costs exceeded provincial government shares long before EPF was introduced.

Senator Stewart also pointed out—and I do not quarrel with his description—that there is an “historical basis” for the allocation formula. I referred to this the other day in debate on second reading. I would like to put the historical basis in context by quoting again from the report of the Parliamentary Task Force:

Moreover, although the allocation formula used by the federal government for EPF . . . reflects the federal expenditure proportions that prevailed nationally in 1975-76, these proportions did not apply to any one province. Significant disparities existed because of differences in post-secondary operating costs across provinces, and consequent disparities in federal contributions. For example, in Quebec over 35 per cent of federal contributions for the three established programs went to post-secondary education in the 1975-76 base year, while in the three Atlantic provinces who chose the $15 per capita system, barely 25 per cent of the federal contributions were for post-secondary education.

I have already made reference to Mr. Joyal's threats and his interpretation of clause 9. I believe we are entitled to know—and I would have thought it proper, legitimate and right that we should have had the opportunity to find out from Mr. Joyal himself in committee—what the federal government's plans are for higher education. What are these educational and economic goals of which the federal government speaks? What definition does the federal government give to this national purpose to be served by post-secondary education?

When Minister Donahoe appeared before the committee, he spoke of discussions that had taken place between the Council of Ministers of Education and the federal government concerning Ottawa's definition of “national objectives”. He told the committee that the best that they could elicit from Ottawa as a statement of national objectives might be summed up in the four headings referred to by Senator Tremblay a few moments ago: one, mobility; two, accessibility; three, accountability for the funds; and four, the official languages.

Minister Donahoe argued that those objectives are now being well served and attained by post-secondary institutions. There may be some argument about that, but Senator Hicks pointed out yesterday afternoon that if that is the best that the Secretary of State can do on “national objectives”, then, in the honourable senator's words, “he ought to do better”. To supplement that remark, I would again place on the record a few sentences from Dr. Andrew MacKay about this subject of national objectives. The following statement was made by Dr. MacKay when he appeared before the House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs:

In my view—and I do not speak perhaps for the association on this aspect, but my own personal view is that the Government of Canada has never decided what its co-ordinated interests in post-secondary education are.

Indeed I think it is fair to say that in Canada as a whole the effort to develop a co-ordinated interest and statement about the objectives of post-secondary education has never been developed. This is not only at the level of the federal government but in some respects within provincial governments. That is why there are commissions under way in a variety of provinces.

● (1510)

At the committee meeting yesterday and in previous debates, Senator Hicks quoted Dr. J. A. Corry on the question of jurisdiction. I do not want to go into this at very much length, not being a constitutionalist. The argument is that while section 93 of the Constitution referred to the powers of a legislature in and for each province, the Canadian Parliament by virtue of the “peace, order and good government” clause of the Constitution had, as Senator Hicks put it, the “requisite competence over needs that transcend provincial boundaries.” Senator Hicks said at the committee meeting—and, again, I trust I am quoting him correctly—that there may be national goals—he was referring to education—that go beyond those of a province and “the federal government ought to be free to move there.”

Honourable senators, I think it is incumbent on Senator Hicks and those who think as he does—and Mr. Joyal may be one of them—to say how far they think the federal government could or should intrude in a matter like education using the “peace, order and good government” clause of the Constitution of Canada. Would they have the federal government decide how much money should go to which universities or community colleges, what the universities should do with the money, what they should teach, how many universities or community colleges there should be in a given province or region and what they should be doing? I think that those are serious questions that it is incumbent upon those who make the argument that the federal government should have a greater role in education and, indeed, should use the “peace, order and good government” clause to exercise that role, to show us how far they think a federal government could or should go in this direction.

I very much regret that because of the government’s insensitive and—

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Dictatorial.

Senator Murray: I was going to say, brutal use of its majority in committee, we were not given the opportunity to address the matter in committee.

The debate on this bill may be coming to an end but the debate on the subject matter is only beginning.

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I simply want to raise a point of order concerning Senator Tremblay’s speech, in which he quoted me, and I believe incorrectly, as saying that I asked Minister Donahoe to show me a student who had been denied admission to a university because of financial problems. The question was the other way around.

I merely wish to say that nothing he said has made me change my mind. I believe that in all provinces, and especially in New Brunswick, with which I am more familiar, there are many students who, for financial, economic and sociological reasons, never get to university because they cannot meet the financial requirements.

I agree with Minister Donahoe that if the Minister of Education or the minister responsible for post-secondary education in New Brunswick could point to the case of someone who is unable to enter university, that steps would be taken to make this possible. I have done so myself when I was there, and this is still being done. It does not solve the problem because there are also many students who do not finish college and even if they do, fail to get to university because they lack the economic and financial resources.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the debate on Bill C-12 has, I feel, demonstrated the usefulness of a second legislative chamber especially in a federal state that considers the problems and concerns of the provinces or member states.

This bill was adopted at all stages in the House of Commons without real debate, and certainly without much attention from the media. Not until the bill was brought to the Senate did we hear statements that have caused real concern among the provinces and authorities in the field of education.

[Senator Murray.]

In fact, it was Minister Joyal who, as it were, lit the powder keg. Of course, I do not mean to compare the Senate to a powder keg, and besides, it would take more than this to blow up the Senate. Furthermore, when I referred to the need for a second legislative chamber to listen to the views of the provinces, I think there is ample proof that this is not happening in this Senate. A reformed Senate might. We shall see, or rather our children will.

Mr. Joyal’s statement led the Committee on National Finance to invite the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of Education, Mr. Donahoe, who appeared before the Committee yesterday to talk about the main objections and concerns of all, I repeat all, provincial Ministers of Education.

Senators Tremblay and Murray mentioned the three main questions of unilateralism, the decision to change the formula and insert certain provisions concerning the allocation of funds to health and post-secondary education, and especially the matter of the objectives the government wanted to, and in fact did, slip into the bill and which Minister Joyal interpreted, as I said earlier.

The first issue is the unilateral aspect of the decision, second, changing the formula and thus restricting payments or availability of funding for the provinces and third, the objectives.

Before discussing this, I would like to quote Minister Joyal and comment on the views of Mr. Corry who was quoted by Senator Hicks, with respect to the jurisdiction of the federal government over education. In my view, there is only one way in which the federal government can intervene in the field of education. It can do so in an area that is not covered by the provincial system. In other words, unlimited spending power does not mean the power to make the provinces spend as the federal government would have them spend. If the federal government wants to spend money in one area of education and says: “That comes under my jurisdiction, because it is in the national interest”—well it has already done so with student loans, for instance. The federal government made student loans available to all students across Canada. No one has been very anxious to challenge the federal government’s authority in this area.

However, while we are on the matter of student loans, perhaps I may be allowed to digress and point out to Senator Thériault that the problem of access should be understood as: Can a student pay his tuition? If you tell me: He cannot, because his family needs him, because he is in a location or environment where he does not have time to go to university, that is different. To me, access is a matter of being able to obtain the funds required to pay one’s tuition.

• (1520)

In this regard I believe that, generally speaking, as Senator Thériault recognized earlier and as Mr. Donahoe said yesterday, a student who wants to find the money to pay his tuition fees for his post-secondary education can surely find the necessary amounts. There are student loans. There are also many provincial and private scholarships, all sorts of assistance. A great number of young people find themselves in a situation where they cannot leave home to pursue their studies, either because they have to help their parents or for some other reason. In that context, there is a lack of accessibility.

However, I underline once more the fact that, under section 93, the federal government is not allowed to interfere in provincial education systems. The power to spend does not give the federal government the right to tell the provinces how or where to spend. This is what is worrying the provinces following the statement made by Mr. Joyal after the bill had been approved by the House of Commons.

I would like to quote from this statement:

Existing agreements on education—

This is the statement made by Mr. Joyal, if I am not mistaken.

—will expire in March 1985 if Ottawa and the provinces cannot agree before then—

About what, I do not know; perhaps about the way to spend.

—Ottawa will go forward with legislation allowing it to turn off the money tap under certain conditions, Mr. Joyal said yesterday.

This statement appeared in the May 24 issue of Le Devoir. We had already heard Miss Bégin, when speaking about health naturally, talk about turning off the money tap. We had not yet heard it related to the field of education and we had not even understood this in the bill before us, but Mr. Joyal then said: "If there is no agreement before March of next year, we shall find a way to legislate to turn off the money tap." We must not forget that all this money comes from the taxpayer's pockets, whether we are referring to federal money, provincial money or the visibility of federal contributions. Unless I am mistaken, we had a sample of this in the Medicare Act, as the government would like all the documents to clearly show the federal contribution. I asked at that time whether the medicare card would have to carry Miss Bégin's picture to show that there is a federal contribution. I imagine that, from now on, all documents needed to gain admission to the university will carry Mr. Joyal's picture. I do not know whether it will be that one as it does not give him a very peaceful look, but he could take either that one or any other one. This is what we find:

For years, the federal government has requested that post-secondary education in Canada, while being strictly under provincial jurisdiction, should meet four objectives: absolute mobility of students from province to province, access to education in their own language for students belonging to a linguistic minority; most of all, Ottawa wants to make sure that the provinces actually inject these funds into education and intends to increase federal visibility in the post-secondary field.

I have just mentioned visibility. The interpretation given by Mr. Joyal to section 9 already mentioned by Senator Murray in particular is clearly an open door and blows a horn for the provinces: "Listen, if you do not do what we want you to do in an area under your exclusive jurisdiction, we will turn off the tap. We will do for education exactly what we did in the field of health care."

Yesterday, when we referred to the conditions of mobility, accessibility, bilingualism, and so on, Mr. Donahoe said several times—and no one was able to contradict him in committee, especially not Mr. Joyal as Senator Frith did not want him to appear and provide the explanations—that the government should be asked what more it wants and what more it expects from the provinces. The provinces are ready to enter discussions if it is only a matter of discussing and trying to agree. There would be no problem in that case.

The federal government has kept its hand to itself. Until now, it has simply said that the criteria must be respected and that if they are not, the money tap will be turned off.

I therefore consider that in this field, as in the field of health care, what we have is a government that wants to dictate to the provinces how they should spend their money. It is using its power to spend to tell the provinces how to spend.

If the equalization formula is changed to enable the federal government to tell the provinces exactly what they are going to do, that puts the provinces on a leash and prevents them from acting as they see fit in accordance with their views and those of their legislative assemblies, or along the lines which, in the opinion of the government, are in the best interests of all provincial residents.

It seems to me that, in those circumstances, the Senate must find a way to sound the alarm, but not at all the way Mr. Joyal has suggested. Instead of saying to the provinces that the tap will be turned off, the central government should be told: Listen, if you want to cooperate in the field of post-secondary education through the equalization formula and adjustments to direct transfers, fine. As far as we in the Senate are concerned, we do not want you to tell the provinces how they will organize their post-secondary education system.

With that in mind, I will move an amendment which will have the effect of striking out sub-paragraphs (d) and (e) of paragraph 24.1 of clause 9 of the bill which has to do with the report the Secretary of State must table before Parliament every year on

(d) the relationship between such federal contributions . . . programs and Canada's educational and economic goals.

Well, I admit that Canada may have educational goals, but not in a field under provincial jurisdiction.

(e) the results of any consultations by or on behalf of the Secretary of State with the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada relating to the definition of national purposes to be served by postsecondary education and the means by which the governments of Canada and the provinces will achieve those purposes.

Those two sub-paragraphs did worry the ministers of education. The Senate ought to be worried as well. Our amendment to strike out those two sub-paragraphs will not kill the bill, quite the contrary. By taking this step, we indicate to the federal government our concern about the fact that it intends—or even only implies, for that matter—to intervene in a field where it has no jurisdiction. It might eventually tell the provinces how to spend the money they are given in accordance with the equalization principle which is enshrined in the Constitution, as Senator Tremblay pointed out earlier.

With this amendment, we are sounding the alarm for the provinces and for the Senate which looks after the constitutional rights and problems of the provinces.

I therefore move, seconded by Senator Murray:

That Bill C-12 be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out sub-paragraphs (d) and (e) of paragraph (1), section 24.1 of Clause 9 (lines 45 to 48 on page 7 and 1 to 9 on page 8) of the said Bill.

I have copies for honourable senators. The amendment is very easy to understand.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think we can easily understand the amendment by referring to the bill itself. It is simply a matter of striking out two sub-paragraphs.

Senator Flynn: You are right.

● (1530)

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, speaking to the amendment, and on the assumption that the observations made by Senators Tremblay, Murray and Flynn were applicable both to the amendment to some extent and also to the bill itself—not that they are limited and unable to speak to the amendment if they so wish—and in order to avoid my speaking on the question of the bill at third reading again, I make these observations.

I might say that the divergent views were quite eloquently put forward by both sides at second reading and, to some extent, in the committee; certainly by Senator Donahoe's son, the distinguished Minister of Education for the Province of Nova Scotia. It seems to me that the essence of the debate and the issue that we finally ought now to face is whether there should be more consultation before the legislation is passed, or whether the legislation should be passed and the consultation continue, as it no doubt always will under a federal system. As Senator Murray has said, the debate on the bill may be coming to an end, but the debate on the question is not, and I agree with him. I am sure that it will continue for a long time.

With respect to six-and-five and the application of that program, most of what was said has been said before, except for Senator Tremblay's comments. However, that does not mean that it ought not to have been repeated and with the force of conviction with which it has been expressed. I think the principle there is that the government is saying that is their policy, and I can't add anything that Senator Hicks has not said, or that has been said on the other side.

As to the decision of the committee not to hear the minister, while the adjectives that were used by Senator Murray were a bit extravagant, I can understand that a person of his rhetorical skill could be carried away by his own rhetoric in some cases. However, in my opinion he did overlook or chose to overlook the reasons that his colleagues gave for not agreeing to have the minister called. I was at the committee meeting and, if I understood them correctly, they said that they certainly agreed that the views of the minister would be interesting, but that they were not relevant to the issue that was before the committee at that time—

Senator Murray: How do you know until you have heard them?

Senator Frith: —namely that while the reasons—we had heard them—

Senator Murray: But not before the committee.

Senator Frith: You cannot have it both ways. You make up your mind that you do not know what the minister might say, or as Senator Murray did, you say, «The minister has made these statements and therefore we should call him before us.»

Senator Murray: Yes, to explain himself.

Senator Frith: That is the senator's view. I suppose it is understandable and quite human that, when it turned out that Senator Murray could not persuade his colleagues that it would aid the committee or the Senate in the consideration of the bill to call the minister, because they disagreed with him or were not persuaded by him, he decided that such inability to agree with him could only be caused by insensitivity and brutality, whereas in fact—

Senator Flynn: The only argument that prevailed was your instructions to the members.

Senator Frith: There were no instructions. The reasons that were given were given by—

Senator Flynn: It is only an argument, and I challenge any other member to—

Senator Frith: Of course, we can interpret the proceedings as we wish. I gave no instructions. In fact, the senators who spoke at the committee meeting gave their own reasons why they did not support Senator Murray's motion, and he considers that a sign only of brutality and insensitivity rather than of conviction sincerely held.

So there is a difference of opinion. It seems to me that the issues are clearly drawn. The question is whether we pass the bill and continue consultation, or continue consultation before we pass the bill. As Senator Steuart said in the committee, his experience and apparently the experience of others who have been ministers of education was that, at a certain time, consultation must stop and you get on with the job, and continue the consultations later.

As to whether the federal government is entitled to say anything about how the money is spent, that again is a matter of policy and I suppose the situation can be summarized by saying that, while the man who pays the piper is not entitled to call all of the tunes, when he pays the piper to the extent that the federal government pays, he should be entitled to request the odd number.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I would like to express a thought or two in connection with the amendment that has been moved by my leader this afternoon. After listening to the speaker on the other side, I have come to the conclusion that we have a remarkable degree of unanimity here in this chamber. If I am to believe Senator Frith, everyone believes that, following the passage of the bill as it now stands, there should be consultation; also that those who do not approve of the passing of the bill as it now stands and who wish to see it amended believe that there should be further consultation. Therefore, all of us, regardless of where we sit in this house, are in favour of further consultation on this very point. That brings us surely to only one conclusion: What should be the conditions under which that consultation is carried on? Should we do it in a manner that reflects conformity with the Constitution as it now stands, or should we stand idly by and allow a bill to pass which contravenes the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and gives to the federal government a degree of authority, a degree of influence, in the matter of consultation that it would not have if the bill were not passed as proposed?

● (1540)

I have stood many times and I have implied, as was perhaps implied here this afternoon, that far too often senators on the other side of the chamber vote not because of their convictions, not because of their beliefs, but because they wish to carry out instructions delivered to them to support the government.

I have said that many times and my comments have been ineffective. I have become tired of saying it and will not say it now, but I do say this to you, and it is the only thought I want to leave with you: Which is the better atmosphere in which to carry out this consultation? This is an important matter to the provinces, and the federal government is intervening in a matter which, according to the Constitution, is within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Should the consultation be carried on, as I said, in an orderly manner and in compliance with the Constitution, or should it be carried on under the whip hand of the federal government?

If you agree that the right way to carry on the consultation is to do it under the threats from Mr. Joyal, under the threats by the federal government that the provinces are liable to be subject to punishment, then by all means do not listen to what is being said by those on this side regarding the desirability of an amendment. If, on the other hand, you are, as I believe you are, reasonable, sensible, constitutionally minded gentlemen, and if you believe that the Constitution—

Senator Frith: As defined by you.

Senator Donahoe: If it is defined by me, you may be sure that I define it much more stiffly than you define it, and therefore it is much more likely that I am correct in stating what I have stated than if I were to wait to hear from you on the subject.

Should we be under the whip hand of the federal government or should we meet like gentlemen in an orderly manner, have regard for the Constitution and endeavour to arrive at a solution that is acceptable to both sides?

I have not the slightest hope of convincing Senator Frith. He is under constraints to do certain things. He is paid, I might even say. He occupies a position that requires him to do certain things and I do not expect to persuade him by reason or by eloquence or in any other way. Therefore, I am not concerned about his comments. But I see that he is not alone; he is surrounded by reasonable men. I appeal to them to give consideration to the atmosphere in which those consultations can best be conducted, an atmosphere that is best produced and best served by passing the proposed amendment.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I can speak only to the amendment, if honourable senators wish, or I can close the debate by replying to the—

Senator Flynn: You can speak, but you cannot close the debate.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You can only close the debate on second reading, not third reading.

Senator Hicks: This is not second reading; this is third reading.

Senator Donahoe: That is what they told you.

Senator Hicks: I started by trying to be conciliatory and meet your views by saying that I can speak either to the amendment strictly, or I can close the debate.

Senator Asselin: You cannot close the debate on third reading; you can do that only on second reading.

Senator Hicks: I see. In that case I will speak strictly to the amendment. I oppose the amendment because it will remove two subclauses of clause 9 of the bill. Indeed, at the committee meeting the motion which my honourable friend made, and which his associates supported, was to delete clause 9 in its entirety. I said that I did not agree with that and that I thought it would be interesting to leave clause 9 in the bill because I think the idea of reporting to Parliament is a good one, and even though I agree that there may be some difficulties in agreeing upon definitions as to the allocation of funds between the federal and provincial governments, I think it would be interesting to see the kinds of reports that came before Parliament as a result of this clause.

I would not have included that particular clause in the bill had I drafted it myself, and neither for that matter did the Secretary of State include it; that clause was added to the bill by a group of members of the House of Commons largely composed of members of the party to which my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition belongs. That is neither here nor there. I think the idea is an interesting one and I would like to see what results from it.

I admit—and Senator Murray has heard me say this before, as have others, perhaps—that subclause (d) is a puzzler, but it will be extremely interesting to see how the Secretary of State reports on that rather nebulous clause, which states:

the relationship between such federal contributions, transfers and programs and Canada's educational and economic goals;

As for subclause (e), I see no objection whatsoever to that. That merely says that if there are consultations between the Secretary of State and the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada, they should be reported to Parliament. That seems to me to be entirely reasonable. It does not require such consultations to take place; it merely requires that if there are such consultations the outcome shall be reported to Parliament.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I propose to vote against the amendment, which would delete subclauses (d) and (e) of clause 9 of the bill.

I have other comments I shall make later regarding other concerns raised by my honourable friends.

Senator Flynn: You will not have an opportunity to do so later.

Senator Hicks: Allow me to complete my sentence. I will have something to say about the observations which my honourable friends have made concerning other matters in the bill later, but that is all I have to say regarding the amendment.

I have been speaking—and I have been very careful—only to the amendment.

Senator Flynn: To be very honest, we could play a trick on Senator Hicks. He has already spoken on the main motion, so he cannot speak again. We are giving you an opportunity to speak on both matters now, but we will not give you that opportunity later.

Senator Hicks: I do not wish to get into a debate on the rules with my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: There is no problem with the rules; they are clear.

Senator Hicks: I will deal briefly with the other matters which have been raised by my honourable friends.

The chief point Senator Tremblay made, which I think needs to be elaborated on or elucidated, has to do with the application of the six-and-five program and whether that applies to the fiscal transfer only or to the cash payment transfer.

I can reply in great detail by reading the detailed way in which those amounts are calculated, but I do not think that that is necessary. The six-and-five program applies to the method of calculating the total entitlement for the Established Programs Financing. Under this legislation, it divides that entitlement amongst post-secondary education and health care services. It then determines, using the figures which Senator Murray has called arbitrary—and I cannot disagree with him, although I could make an argument but I do not think it is necessary—that the proportions of the block funding introduced in 1977 would allocate 32.1 per cent to post-secondary education and 67.9 per cent to health services. These figures are then determined on a per capita basis, multiplied by the population of each province and the gross figure of the transfer for both the established programs is determined. The figure for post-secondary education only is limited to 6 per cent for the 1983-84 fiscal year and to 5 per cent on the per capita amount for the 1984-85 fiscal year.

• (1550)

The tax points are then collected in exactly the same way as they are now, which is uniform for all provinces except Quebec where they are collected directly by the province. Then, the cash payments are calculated by deducting the amount resulting from the tax points from the total amount determined by using the escalator, to which I have referred and which is now modified or limited by the six-and-five. Therefore, there is not intended to be, and cannot be, any interference in the payments derived by the concession of tax points from the federal government to the several provinces.

Senator Tremblay: May I ask a further question on this point? If I understand correctly, the 6 per cent or the 5 per cent, according to the year, will apply to the growth of the yield of the transfer—

Senator Hicks: The total transfer of payments, not the tax points.

Senator Tremblay: It would apply jointly to the part which is a transfer of equalized tax points and to the cash payments. I am sure you know that the growth of the amounts corresponding to the equalized tax points will be higher than six or five.

Senator Hicks: That may be right in some provinces.

Senator Tremblay: In general, and particularly in the case of those provinces that do not get equalization because, as you know, equalization is based on the Canadian average and there are provinces that will get equalization if they are below the average and others will not. How do you apply the 6 per cent in the case of a province which will not receive equalization? You would then limit the growth of a provincial tax, of a tax which as been transferred to the province. I am speaking of a very significant precedent in terms of the overall system of fiscal arrangements. You might not reach any conclusion about that today, but I draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that if your answer to my question is the one you have just given, the ultimate consequence of that is questioning the whole system that we have been establishing over the past 30 years. I would like that to be analyzed more fully and to get a specific answer.

Senator Hicks: I cannot say much more now, but I do not quite see it that way. I think the yield from the tax points, whether equalized or not, depending on which province is involved, is not interfered with. But, quite obviously, when you have calculated the total sum which is to be transferred in relation to post-secondary education, as an increase over the previous year of the six-and-five, then if, as a result of the increase in the yield from the tax point transfer, the sum from that source going to a given province is greater, then the cash transfer will be less. If the equalized tax point transfer is less, then the cash payment to that province will be greater. I understand Senator Tremblay's point, and I thank him for his courtesy in explaining it to me in English, which I followed with greater facility, but I think that the result does not impinge upon those principles which have been operating for the past 30 years, because the adjustment is made against the balance of the cash transfer. That is as far as I can comment on it at the present time.

Senator Murray was concerned about clause 9, but I have already dealt with this. It is known from my remarks on second reading and in other places, that I am not anxious to curtail the revenues available to our universities, but that I am concerned, and I think that the federal government is entitled to be concerned, at its disproportionate and increasing support of the universities and the generally diminishing support of the provinces for universities. That is why I was willing to sponsor this bill because I think that the performance of the federal government in support of post-secondary education has not been too bad, as the record shows, but some of the provinces particularly have fallen down on what they should do.

The provinces claim, and it has been claimed on their behalf in this debate this afternoon, that they have exclusive jurisdiction over education, including post-secondary education. I have challenged that, but without expecting my views to prevail in the present climate in Canada and even in relation to the present Government of Canada. But be that as it may, if the provinces are going to be so jealous as to claim an exclusive jurisdiction in relation to post-secondary education, then they ought to be more willing to assume—perhaps one could even say—an exclusive responsibility for post-secondary education in those provinces. This they have not been willing to do.

This brings me to the point which has been referred to by both Senator Murray and Senator Flynn, that it is wrong for the federal government, even if it does transfer substantial sums of money in support of post-secondary education, to have anything to say about the application of those funds. I do not believe that at all. I think that even if education is the exclusive responsibility of the provinces—and I will not debate that point further at the present time—and if the federal government wants to make a contribution in support of education, then it ought to have the right to say something about the application of those funds. Indeed, I point out that the first time the federal government supported post-secondary education in Canada, they did so by making direct grants to the universities of this country. This, of course, was done under Mr. St. Laurent beginning in 1951. It is not unheard of for the federal government to enter into direct arrangements with the universities of Canada or, in this instance, through the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

I have also made it perfectly clear that I was not enthusiastic about, and, indeed, that I opposed the block funding arrangements which occurred after 1977, because they further removed the federal government from any presence in post-secondary education, or from any influence in the application of the funds once they had been transferred to the provinces. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why we are in the kind of hassle that we are in today because the provinces have used these funds in the way they were perfectly properly and legally able to do, but, nevertheless, not in accordance with the basis of the calculation which had induced the federal government to transfer these funds to them, whether by allocation of tax points or by the direct transfer of cash grants.

Senator Murray said that those who debate the role or the position of the federal government in relation to education, including post-secondary education, ought to be prepared to enunciate the role which they think the federal government should have. I do not think that that is germane to this debate, but I have already hinted at some of the things that I would do. I would approve of direct grants from the federal government to the universities. This is done in a great many other countries, including some federal countries, and in some respects and for some aspects of education in the United States, the great country to the south of us.

● (1600)

As for the question with respect to consultation, I do not know whether the federal government could have waited any longer to make its move. Whether one agrees with it or not, this bill represents that move. I tend to think that, perhaps, we had better pass this bill and get on with the consultations afterwards.

I note that Mr. Joyal, the much and unpopularly quoted Secretary of State, if one is to judge from the remarks in the Senate this afternoon, has said that he is setting up a task force to review the federal role in post-secondary education under Mr. Al Johnson, who is certainly a very competent person to undertake a task such as that. How effective it will be, I do not know. I express the hope that Mr. Joyal, and his successor or successors, will take this task force very seriously, give it the support it needs and that, at long last, we might have an analysis of the federal government's position vis-a-vis its support of established program financing and, in this respect particularly, the established programs relating to the support of post-secondary education. I fervently hope that that will be so.

It is rather interesting to note that when I was cynical about this aspect at the committee meeting yesterday afternoon, Minister Donahoe from Nova Scotia expressed much greater optimism than either Senator Davey Stuart or myself with respect to the likelihood of such consultations between the provinces and the federal government resulting in agreement. I made the remark then, somewhat facetiously, that since he was younger than Senator Stuart and myself that, perhaps, he was entitled to be more optimistic—I certainly hope that he is right.

Again, I do not see the relevance of discussing in this debate the question of whether or not there may be some students who cannot afford to go to universities because they do not have sufficient financial support. I would not have gone as far as Minister of Education Donahoe did yesterday when he contended that there was not a single student in Nova Scotia—the province to which he was referring, I presume—who could not attend university because of financial considerations. I would not go that far; however, I think, generally speaking, students who have the capability of benefiting from university education as a result of the programs of this federal government, and of the governments of several provinces in Canada, can manage to attend university and obtain their university degree. Then, if they have established their competence, they will find it even easier to continue their education into graduate work.

The only other note I made was with respect to Senator Flynn's statement that the spending power does not allow the federal government to tell the provinces how to spend the money—perhaps not. However, what it certainly enables it to do is to exercise a judgment of its own as to whether or not it would give that money to the provinces. Here, I think the federal government is entitled to say, «We transfer this money to you in support of post-secondary education and you may not use it for highways, public works or something else.» This is one of the reasons why I was unhappy with the block financing that has characterized our support of the established programs since 1977. While I am still opposed to it, I hope that as a result of Mr. Johnson's task force, or whatever other devices we may resort to, this situation between the federal government and the provinces may be improved in the years ahead.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I rise for the purpose of putting one question, if I may, to Senator Hicks.

Senator Hicks has stated that it is his personal view that the federal government ought to return to direct grants to universities. I ask him whether there would be conditions attached to those grants and what type of conditions, in general, would attach?

Senator Hicks: Thank you, Senator Murray, for your question.

There never were conditions attached in the years following 1951. I would favour no conditions being attached except that the amounts transferred would vary, perhaps in accordance with the types of program that were supported, more in support of expensive graduate programs and professional programs and so on, and less in support of the inexpensive undergraduate programs. Doing this on a per student basis would seem to me, as it was in 1951, to be a fair way of going about it.

However, the great error in the 1951 system of transfer was that the money was not transferred on the basis of a relationship to the population of the universities themselves but, rather, was transferred on the basis of the population of the province in which the university was located. In my opinion, that was the great flaw in the Honourable Louis St. Laurent's formula commencing in 1951.

Senator Murray: It was certainly a great flaw from Nova Scotia's point of view since, as I recall, Nova Scotia had a higher university population per capita than many other provinces.

I would like to know whether or not the grant would apply to community colleges as well, and whether or not conditions would attach to those grants and, if so, what type of conditions.

[Senator Hicks.]

Senator Hicks: I am not prepared this afternoon to outline a new federal grant program. As I have said, I do not see much likelihood that my proposal will be adopted now, in any event. The one great difficulty arises from the strong views held by my friends in the Province of Quebec, which I understand and with which I sympathize to a certain extent. Nevertheless, I do not agree with them from my own experience. It is a matter of policy as to the nature of these transfers. For example, in Nova Scotia, post-secondary education was defined to include grade 12 of the so-called public school system. In my view that was wrong. That should never have been included at all in the entitlement for these funds. Again, I think that the federal government ought to discuss this matter carefully with provincial authorities, and with others, in order to come up with its program.

However, honourable senators, we are now in the realm of speculation. I wish that I had a forum and some authority to declaim on this subject, because I would like to participate in a task force that tackled this interesting and difficult problem.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a supplementary question of Senator Hicks.

Senator Hicks mentioned the problem of definition of post-secondary education. God only knows whether or not we had a definition in the 1950s in the case of the Province of Quebec with respect to classical colleges. At that time the question was whether or not they should be included in the definition of university. That was a big question. However, I do not want to return to that subject.

If the federal government does define a starting point for post-secondary education, do you think that in so doing it will be legislating with respect to education? That is to say, the federal government would decide where post-secondary education begins, which involves the whole structure of the educational system. Would that be included in legislation or not?

Senator Hicks: It might not be included in legislation. However, I cannot deny that if those determinations were made unilaterally it would certainly be an influence on the educational policies of the province concerned. I am saying that this is only being done as a method of calculating the sums of money to be transferred to institutions of higher learning, or to the provinces on behalf of institutions of higher learning.

Perhaps I expressed myself too cynically yesterday afternoon in committee, but, like Minister Donahoe, I think these matters could be worked out among men of goodwill. I think that while the circumstances are bound to be changing continually, and that this debate will go on beyond the lifetime of the members of this chamber, I see no reason why we should not still try to tackle the problems and solve them, at least with respect to the immediate or reasonably foreseeable future, if not for all time.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I did not speak to the amendment, but I want to make two small comments.

The purpose of the amendment is to indicate to the federal government that we do not want leadership, control or supervision. That was the expression used by Mr. Ryan who is the official critic of the Liberal opposition in Quebec City and who spoke with the authority of his rank.

Secondly, with respect to telling the provinces what to do with the money transferred to them in accordance with the equalization formula, I think that Senator Hicks would be well advised to read again section 36 of the Constitution Act, 1981, as follows:

(2) Parliament and the government of Canada are committed to the principle of making equalization payments to ensure that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation.

It does not say anything about asking questions. It is an obligation which the federal government has assumed pursuant to section 36.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lapointe, P.C., that this bill be now read a third time.

● (1610)

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray:

That Bill C-12 be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out sub-paragraphs (d) and (e) of paragraph (1), section 24.1 of Clause 9 (lines 45 to 48 on page 7 and 1 to 9 on page 8) of the said Bill.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it. And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1984-85

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-45, intituled: "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1985".—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Flynn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this bill granting the last part of supply for the current year is in the usual form. For this reason, there is very little that I or anyone else can say which has not already been said when we discussed the estimates and the budget brought down by Mr. Lalonde some time ago.

This amount of $92 billion means that we have reached a new high. We shall also set a new record as far as this year's deficit is concerned. This deficit has been somewhat lower than the projected $31 billion. It will be $30 billion for the last year. This one will be about in the same range of figures.

If there is anything substantial which we might have done in the Senate about these amounts, it would have been in the National Finance Committee. The committee examined these appropriations. They concentrated mostly on examining the accounting methods of the government. We know that it wrote a report which was tabled in this house on May 31. This report was most interesting. Perhaps it dealt more with expenditure control after the fact than with the estimates. I feel this is excellent work. I have always wondered if we could rely on public accounts, and to what extent we could "retouch" the figures. There still remain many possibilities. I am not convinced we can ever find ways or procedures that truly enable Parliament to control expenditures.

Looking at the Auditor General's report and the problems faced by the Comptroller General, we know that Parliamentary control is more or less illusory.

In fact, the House of Commons has the prime responsibility in that matter because ours is minor; we only have a monitoring role. We have the constitutional right to oppose an appropriation bill. Practically, realistically speaking, we would have no justification to oppose it. We do not have a real mandate from the people to oppose appropriation. All we can do is give advice from time to time. As in other areas, we act as a sort of advisory council.

The Liberal majority is not reluctant to advise the government as long as this does not create difficulties for the government. In this area, this is what we did when the committee examined our accounting methods. This is excellent. From time to time, we do excellent work, especially regarding the conduct of some of our inquiries.

In this area, more still than in any other, all we can do of value, looking at a situation in a very realistic view, is occasionally tell the government to do this rather than that.

I already have managed to have the system of those appropriation bills changed, so that the numbering is no longer so confusing.

The Committee on National Finance issued excellent recommendations. Concerning the bill now before us, there is not much we can say about the form. It is standard. The House of Commons dealt with the amounts involved. Strangely, although the House of Commons debates the budget throughout the session, it seldom bothers to check whether or not money was wasted.

I referred yesterday to all the work going on on Parliament Hill. It is meant to provide jobs, which is very important as election time is approaching. We can only wonder if the rebuilding of the beautiful entrances for the two Speakers is not a complete waste. I am full of admiration for our Speaker. It is not for him personally that they are being rebuilt. I am sure he never asked for that. I am sure the Speaker of the House of Commons never did ask for that either. There can be a lot of waste. The government can rarely do anything to stop waste and really control spending.

The day may come when the House of Commons will find an approach. It is not really the role of the Senate to do so.

Again, in this area, I suggest we should support it. The Senate acts in an advisory capacity. It did so through the National Finance Committee in studying accounting practices.

I do not object to this bill being now read a second time. This clearly can be done without a referral to a committee, the National Finance Committee having had the opportunity to deal with it. We do not object either to this bill being read a third time tomorrow, so that the government can really get involved in the election campaign. In the best interest of Canadians, I hope it will bring about a change of government, so that a Progressive Conservative team can replace this tired old team and give it a very long and deserved rest.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I would like to advise the Senate that if Senator Frith speaks now, he will end the debate on the second reading of the bill.

Senator Frith: I have almost nothing to add. I merely wanted to express my agreement with the preliminary comments and the main part of Senator Flynn's speech. Unfortunately I disagree with his epilogue.

I would like to point out, as mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, that there is a connection between the legislation, the budget and our Committee on National Finance. As Senator Flynn said, the bill generally states in figures the principles underlying the budget. We have already dealt with that.

With respect to the committee, as mentioned yesterday and as pointed out by Senator Flynn, the estimates but not the bill are referred to the committee. Thus, the most important aspect of the bill is considered in committee. Finally, I would like to point out that our committee's report, which is part of the Debates of the Senate of May 31, demonstrates the thoroughness of the work done in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE IMPACT OF TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE ON CANADIAN SOCIETY

● (1640)

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, pursuant to notice of Thursday, May 31, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and consider the impact of technological change on the fabric of Canadian society;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination; and

That the Committee present its report no later than September 30, 1985.

He said: Honourable senators, I had a one hour speech prepared but I see that the time is limited, so I will not deliver the whole of it. I know that honourable senators have other things to do.

Basically, in order to gain support for this motion, I would like to say that it is not my intention that this study should commence this spring. If the motion is adopted between now and the end of June, I suggest we could make a start on the groundwork with respect to the planning of how to study a motion of this nature in that time.

The introduction of new technologies in Canadian life has given rise to totally new industries and has created employment in fields which did not exist a decade or two ago. New technologies have regenerated old industries and substantially improved productivity in others.

Canadians have benefited from increased access to cultural events, entertainment and information, thanks to the inclusion of new broadcast transmission bands and telephone links by satellites. Children have shown an astonishing facility with computerized instruction programs, many of them designed for Canadian schools.

New diagnostic tools developed through the miracles of solid state electronics and biotechnology are now able to detect and arrest previously elusive medical conditions.

Canadians have been in the forefront of alternative energy technologies as North America has turned away from expensive imported oil.

New processes, such as the recycling of pulp and paper mill wastes and certain hydrometallurgical processes, have important secondary benefits, such as reducing pollution.

There have been tremendous strides made in the regeneration of old industries. Spar Aerospace's Canadarm has brought about many changes in industry. Canadian mines have also adopted new methods of technology.

In the communications field, farmers in rural Manitoba now have access to Telidon weather and news reports, banking, cable television and FM radio. Telephone links via satellite have encouraged the growth of new companies.

In the Northwest Territories the Inuit can now receive broadcasts in their native language. Even direct-to-home broadcasting on the 14/12 gigahertz band transmitted by the Anik C and D satellites is now possible.

In the area of medicine and biotechnology, just today I received a copy of a publication entitled Spectrum which describes new tools which have been made available to astronomers in recent years. Masses of data with respect to the universe have been produced. This is something in its beginning stage and still expanding.

New technology is being developed with respect to multiple sclerosis, a disease which is difficult to detect in its early stages. The damage which it does to the nervous system has not been easy to monitor. Studies now point to a defect in the immuno-regulatory system.

I notice as well in the last issue of Spectrum an article with respect to sickle-cell anaemia, a genetic disease which has claimed millions of victims in many parts of the world. Preventing and treating this disease is a major problem. A research team has now synthesized a compound which not only promises to inhibit sickling of blood cells but has been shown to make sickled cells revert to a normal shape.

Each day science and technology is advancing. It is difficult to keep up with these advances. Thus, Canadian citizens must be prepared for rapid changes in order to adjust to and benefit from these changes in technology. For that reason, I feel that a committee of the Senate should look into the impact of technological change on Canadian society. In this way we can learn what the changes are and we can advise Canadians how best to take advantage of them in order to cope with the fast changing world ahead of us.

Honourable senators, I ask for your support with respect to this motion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of Senator Bonnell. I have no difficulty in agreeing to the passage of his motion. However, he says that he does not foresee the committee performing any work this summer. Rather, he speaks of next fall. I cannot see Parliament coming back in the fall. There will probably be a new Parliament at the end of the year at which time this motion will have to be revived. My point is, what can be done immediately that would be really useful?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, my view is that this becomes a major study. There is a great deal of ground work and consulting to be done to find out what is taking place. A critical analysis must be done so that we can follow through with this scheme and be ready to bring this report before the Senate next September.

● (1650)

If an election is called in the meantime, then we may very well end up with more changes than we ever anticipated. However, when we return to the Senate in the fall, I am sure that the majority of the senators who are now with us will still be with us at that time, and if they have agreed to this motion now, I feel sure that they will also agree to it in then. Therefore, I see no reason why we cannot pass this motion at this stage of the session. If, when we return in the fall there is a tremendous change, the motion can be passed again and at that time we will carry on and complete the work.

Senator Flynn: I was thinking of the notice that Senator Bonnell gave us earlier about seeking authority for this committee to inquire into some other matter. I have forgotten the specifics; there are so many things that Senator Bonnell has asked permission for his committee to look into. However, I know that earlier today he gave notice of another reference to his committee. At that time, I thought that perhaps he was piling things up a little.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I gave notice of a motion, but I am not asking that it be debated this spring or summer. As you will note from the notice, the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology will not be required to report on this particular matter until September of 1985. However, there is also a great deal of ground work necessary. We have a very active committee; we have members on our committee who are champing at the bit, and it is my view that we should give them every encouragement.

Senator Flynn: You have convinced me.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have just returned from the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, so you will forgive me if the matter on which I am about to speak has been raised. I notice that in the Debates of the Senate of Monday, June 4, 1984, there was a notice of a meeting for Thursday of this week of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. However, in today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, that notice does not appear. Can the chairman of that committee tell us what transpired or give us an explanation?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, a meeting of the steering committee of the Social Affairs Committee was held yesterday, and the meeting of the full committee scheduled for Thursday, June 7 will not be held, and a notice will go out to that effect.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Leblanc has pointed out to me an error in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Tuesday, June 5, 1984, and I see no reason why it cannot be corrected, in order to ensure that the error is not perpetuated.

On page viii of that edition of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, there is a typographical error in the French version of this motion. In the English version, the last paragraph of the motion states:

That the Committee present its report no later than September 30, 1985.

En français, c'est 1984. I do not think that there is any great importance to the fact that that typographical error was made, but perhaps we should make sure that it is not perpetuated.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, June 7, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs presents it

ELEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-241 intituled: "An Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act", has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 5, 1984, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN NEIMAN
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have three small comments to make. The other day, when the bill was presented, Senator Molson mentioned that the matter was confined to members of the House of Commons and did not apply to the Senate. Senator Molson wondered whether the bill should be amended to include members of the Senate.

I agree this is unnecessary, because Sections 22 and following cover such cases for members of the Senate. However, the objective of this bill is not necessarily being achieved with this amendment. Section 20 is being amended to require, in a contract involving payment of public money, a clause to the effect that members of the House of Commons may not be a party to the contract or may not benefit from it.

In fact, what we are saying here is that the clause does not have to be included if the contract does not involve payment of public money. I submit this is not enough, because if the member is not supposed to benefit from a certain type of contract, he is not necessarily exempted because we say it is unnecessary to insert this clause.

I feel the amendment should have been drafted with a paragraph amending Section 21 accordingly. This section provides for exceptions, and I quote:

21. This Act does not extend to disqualify any person as a member of the House of Commons . . .

The exceptions follow.

The bill could have provided, for instance, that Crown land could be leased to a member provided it was done on the same basis as for any other taxpayer.

It depends how the amendment is interpreted, because, for instance, a member could very well lease Crown land for considerations other than money, and this would then be considered acceptable. That is certainly not the purpose of this bill.

Eventually, the entire Act will have to be revised and the conflict of interest issue reconsidered.

I would like to say, for the record, that I am far from convinced that this amendment will achieve what it sets out to do.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Chairman of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Senator Neiman, told me this afternoon that this question had been discussed in committee and that Senator Flynn arrived towards the end of the discussion because he had been working on another committee.

Because of the views he has expressed here and in committee, the committee itself will have to look at the suggestions and be satisfied with the final result. It is an acceptable, but only temporary, solution.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, June 12, 1984, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

If leave is granted, I shall give an explanation and make some comments about our program for next week.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, last week I suggested that we should sit this week and next week on Monday evening, Tuesday at 2 o'clock, Wednesday at 2 o'clock and Thursday at 2 o'clock. What developed this week is that we sat on Monday at 8 o'clock, Tuesday at 8 o'clock and Wednesday and Thursday at 2 o'clock.

I had proposed to have us come back Monday evening of next week because I was informed by the leader of the house in the other place that it may pass some non-controversial legislation on Friday, as has become their habit. That would mean that we could receive it Monday evening. I discussed the matter with Senator Flynn and we recommend that, rather than coming back Monday evening, we come back Tuesday at 2 o'clock. At that time we could start to deal with any legislation passed in the other place on Friday. If, by any chance, at 5:45 o'clock Tuesday, the House of Commons passes any legislation we want to deal with, we could sit Tuesday night to receive it and start debate on it. I have no indication that this will happen but it is possible. That is the reason we are asking honourable senators to come back Tuesday at 2 o'clock.

As for the balance for the week, as honourable senators know, the other place is adjourning on Thursday at 6 o'clock for reasons of great national import—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It could be a national disaster.

Senator Frith: You mean as was the case about a year ago and for similar reasons? Obviously, we will not sit past Thursday. As honourable senators also know, we are having Royal Assent at 4.30 this afternoon if the Appropriation Bill is passed. It is possible that we will have Royal Assent next week as well. I would expect that the moment we are told that there is no more legislation coming from the other place, we will probably consider adjourning, so it is possible we will adjourn on Wednesday or even Tuesday of next week.

So, honourable senators, we will sit next Tuesday at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, possibly Tuesday evening, and Wednesday at 2 o'clock. We might very well adjourn then having had Royal Assent if there is no other legislation expected from the other place.

That is a rather lengthy explanation, honourable senators, but I know how important the details are when making one's plans.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADIAN SPORTS POOL CORPORATION

SALE OF TICKETS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

It has been reported in the newspapers of the city of Edmonton—which is located in the province from which the Leader of the Government comes—that the Canada Sports Pool Corporation has decided to give the mandate to sell sports pool tickets to the Post Office.

Would the Leader of the Government confirm or deny that, and if he confirms it, would he tell us why the government is entering into another field of commercial activity?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I could engage in the same violation of the rules as is now the case with the Leader of the Opposition. He knows that citation 357(e) of Beauchesne's absolutely prohibits him from—

Senator Flynn: You have read that.

Senator Olson: I have read it and I understand it clearly. I will quote it to you in a moment or so if you wish. It says that one must not comment on the validity of press speculation.

I will go further than that and take the question as notice. At this point in time I doubt that the press speculation has any validity, but I shall refer the question to the minister responsible.

Senator Flynn: On the point of order that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has raised, he knows very well that that rule is an interpretation by Beauchesne, and dates back to time immemorial.

I could phrase the question differently and ask whether it is correct that the Canada Sports Pool Corporation has decided—and there will be no reference to the press report—to give the mandate of selling those sports pool tickets to the Post Office.

You are causing a lot of problems for nothing when you try to hide behind that rule, because that does not mean anything now. You can read it if you wish, but I have read it and the difference is that I understand what the rule means.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not think it takes a great intellect to understand the very simple language that is in this rule, but, because the Leader of the Opposition may want to reflect on his interpretation, I shall read it to him. The particular rule is citation 357(e), and is found in the Fifth Edition of Beauchesne. It states:

A question oral or written must not:

and I underline the words "must not":

(e) inquire whether statements made in a newspaper are true.

I should never annoy the Leader of the Opposition by raising this, because he knows he is out of order according to the rules and practices, but in any event—

Senator Flynn: I have no objection to that. It is about time that we ceased to hear any more about those antiquated rules. They were established in 1867, but this is 1984 and it is about time that that was changed. That type of question would never be ruled out of order in the other place.

Senator Olson: I sat in the other place for many years, and when authority to put a question was based on a newspaper article—and I have been witness to dozens of occasions when the Speaker made such a ruling—they were ruled out of order. So, let us have no misunderstanding about that.

Senator Flynn: The preamble to the question is not based on the newspaper but whether someone has said something which is reported in the press—that is something else.

● (1420)

Senator Olson: That depends on whether or not newspaper reports are true. In any event, I offered to be generous—

Hon. Martial Asselin: In any event, you do not know the answer.

Senator Olson: —with the Leader of the Opposition and take the question as notice. He does not seem to be satisfied with that route. However, I think I will be helpful to him anyway.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

CRITICISM BY CROWN AGENCIES

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to demonstrate how to ask a question properly. In so doing I will refer to an article by Mavor Moore which appeared in The Globe and Mail this morning. His article deals with Bill C-24 about which he had this to say:

Bill C-24, framed to enhance the financial accountability of such wayward Crown corporations as de Havilland, by extension catches in its net such cultural agencies as the Canada Council—

As Mr. Moore points out the act explicitly states that:

The Council is not an agent of Her Majesty, and . . . the members and employees and the director and associate director of the council are not part of the public service of Canada.

Therefore, the Deputy Minister for Culture and Communications, Mr. Robert Rabinovitch, by virtue of his office, has no right to give instructions to anyone on, or in, the Canada Council about anything. Now, here comes the question, and I am just asking if it is true:

—Robert Rabinovitch, recently telephoned the director of the Canada Council, Timothy Porteous, and instructed him that public criticism of the Government's plan, by himself or the staff or even members of the council's board, would not be tolerated.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That is a written question.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): The answer is: I do not know.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Then find out.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You did not raise any point of order with respect to the question.

Senator Godfrey: I framed it properly.

Senator Flynn: Coming from your side of the house it is always better.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to another subject. The bad news is that—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Has it been reported in the press?

Senator Murray: No; there is nothing speculative about my question. I am speaking of an announcement from an agency of the government itself which contains bad news. The bad news is that the bank rate was increased a few moments ago to 11.77 per cent.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators will recall, as the minister himself should recall, that the bank rate has been on an upward trend since approximately mid-February when the Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Frith, described this trend as a "temporary mutation". In mid-February when Senator Frith described the trend as such the rate was at approximately 9.5 per cent. A couple of weeks ago it rose to 11.78 per cent and there has been some irregular movement since then. Today it has risen from 11.54 per cent to 11.77 per cent.

[Senator Godfrey.]

I should like to know what the response of the government is to this trend. In particular, does the government expect, as a result of this increase in the bank rate, that market rates will increase, specifically mortgage rates and other interest rates in the private sector? I would also like to know whether or not the government is giving any consideration at all to the effect of this trend on the already limping pace of economic recovery.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we regret that the rate has moved up. However, it has done so in response to market conditions as a result of the movement of funds in the international market. The Government of Canada feels that it ought to accommodate itself to this international market.

My reply to the honourable senator is exactly the same as the reply we have given a number of times in this chamber and is the same as the reply given by the Minister of Finance in the other place when questions of this sort have arisen.

Insofar as the latter part of the honourable senator's question is concerned, that is, whether or not the rate has moved up enough to trigger a change in the prime rate, mortgage rates and so on which usually follow, I am not sure. The increase from 11.54 per cent to 11.77 per cent is a fairly significant change when compared to the increases which have taken place over the last three or four months.

EXCHANGE VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. During the past week I had occasion to transfer a sum of money to the United States. In so doing I was obliged to pay the current rate of exchange as well as the bank charges in connection therewith. On that day I was dismayed to read in the newspaper that the Canadian dollar was at its lowest value in history.

My question is based upon the fact that a few years ago when the Canadian dollar was being quoted at a discount in terms of the American dollar, Mr. Diefenbaker attempted to peg the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the American dollar at 90 cents.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): At 92.5 cents.

Senator Donahoe: At any rate, it was at 90 cents or more, and was closer to the value of the American dollar. At that time, the party to which my honourable friend belonged felt impelled to issue for the delectation of the voters throughout the country what they called "Diefen-dollars." They printed and circulated those dollars throughout the country to indicate that the country was going to hell because Mr. Diefenbaker was in power and the dollar was losing its value.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): So far they were right.

Senator Donahoe: The value of the dollar on the day I transacted my business was roughly 77 cents American. My question to the Leader of the Government is whether there is any relationship between the rate of interest that has been quoted by my honourable friend and the decline of the dollar of which I was so disastrously a victim?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want to comment on what Senator Donahoe has described as being disastrously a victim. That is not my concern, although—

Senator Flynn: In those days you were a Social Creditor.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You did not belong to the same party then.

Senator Flynn: You were willing to print money as fast as you could.

Senator Olson: Anyone who has any knowledge of the financial situation knows that there is a relationship between the value of the dollar and the relative interest rates in Canada and in the United States.

Senator Donahoe: My supplementary question is: What are you doing about it?

Senator Asselin: Nothing!

Senator Olson: The marketplace is establishing these rates, and if it is the position of honourable senators opposite that they want to impose controls, then they should state that and not play around the periphery, claiming that they can do it without all the mandatory controls that go with it.

Senator Donahoe: I have a further supplementary question. I will not divulge the source of my knowledge, but about a week ago I was informed that the Canadian government spent the sum of $371 million from its reserves to support the sagging Canadian dollar. My question is: Do you propose to continue that course of action, and, if so, how much money do you have to continue it with?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a decision that is made by the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I believe that in the past three months the bank has spent close to a billion dollars to defend the Canadian dollar, and it replenished its reserves last month by drawing on a standby line of credit. I should like to know whether the government or the bank is prepared to draw further on their standby credits to defend the dollar, which has been reaching unprecedented lows, or whether they intend to let the dollar find its own level.

• (1430)

Senator Olson: If I understand the question correctly, the honourable senator has asked whether the government intends to allow the marketplace to function in order to let the dollar find its level. Yes, that has been the position of the government. From time to time, as has been explained, the Bank of Canada intervenes to take off some of the pressure caused by the wider speculation that may have an influence on that level. It is not the position of the government, however, and I believe it is true to say the same for the Bank of Canada, to interfere unduly with the level at which the market will adjust the relative value of its currencies.

It should also be noted that, while the Canadian dollar declined by .6 per cent against the U. S. dollar in May—that figure reflects all of the changes that took place in the entire month—it rose 1.9 per cent against a weighted average of all other major overseas currencies. Therefore, while the Canadian dollar is down in relation to the American dollar, it is in a strong position and has strengthened during May in relation to all other currencies.

Senator Murray: With regard to the last point raised by the Leader of the Government, it is really a piece of irrelevant nonsense—

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: —to assert that the Canadian dollar is showing some strength when it has been declining steadily against the currencies of our two most important trading partners, the United States and Japan. The minister says that the dollar is gaining against the guilder or the French franc, currencies of countries with whom we have perhaps 2 per cent of our trade. That may be important for people who spend their vacations in France—as, perhaps, a great many of my honourable friend's colleagues will be doing next week—but it is not of much consequence to the economy at all.

The fact of the matter is that the Canadian dollar has been steadily losing ground against the currencies of our two most important trading partners, the United States and Japan. I notice that the minister is shaking his head, indicating “no.” I say that he is wrong.

To come back to the main point, I do not know how the minister can say with a straight face that the government and the Bank of Canada are allowing the market forces to operate when, in the last three months, the bank has spent $1 billion of its reserves to defend the dollar and has just called on some standby credits. More than that, we are getting into a vicious circle here because the reasons that are cited today in the financial markets for the further decline in the dollar are, first, that Canada's balance of payments has shifted into a deficit position again, and secondly, that the news came out within the last little while that $300 million was spent in May to defend the dollar. The dollar has therefore taken another decline on the basis of that kind of news.

I simply ask the minister this question: What is the intention of the government with regard to this matter? Is it prepared to draw further on standby credits? How far is it prepared to go to defend the dollar? I do not ask him to give an answer which everybody knows is sheer fiction—the fiction that the government is allowing the market forces to operate.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is Senator Murray's opinion—

Senator Donahoe: And it is the truth!

Senator Olson: —or fabricated opinion, whichever one prefers, because the statement I made a few minutes ago is the fact with respect to this matter. Senator Murray must know that it is well for those who speculate in currencies to realize that, from time to time, the Bank of Canada—as, indeed, the central bank of any other country—will come to the defence of its currency when there is an unusual or an unjustified movement. That is what the Bank of Canada has been doing.

ENERGY

SASKATCHEWAN—HEAVY OIL PROJECT

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a less controversial question to put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is designed to build confidence in the Canadian economy. I refer to the mega-project proposed for the upgrading of heavy oil in Saskatchewan, which project was announced yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Jean Chrétien. Is this one of the projects involved in the announcement made by the leader some months ago?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I remember correctly, some months ago a question was posed as to whether mega-projects were all antiquated or dead. The answer I gave was, no, they were not dead and that a number of them were under active consideration.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Resurrected for the election.

Senator Olson: No, I said a number were being actively pursued, albeit on a smaller scale.

In reply to Senator Bosa's question, I would point out that this is the fifth one of which it has been positively announced that it will go forward.

Senator Flynn: And not the last.

Senator Olson: No, there are several more.

Hon. Martial Asselin: When will the next one be announced? Before the election?

Senator Olson: We will do this as rapidly as we can come to an agreement.

Senator Flynn: What is his answer?

Senator Asselin: Ask Mr. Turner; he will tell you.

Senator Olson: A number of additional projects in the oil upgrading field, of a smaller scale than was first anticipated, are actively being pursued. We will make announcements on them as soon as possible.

AIR CANADA

RUMOURED PRIVATIZATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he can confirm or deny the rumours in the financial world that, in view of the recent announcement of the deregulation of the air industry in Canada, Air Canada will be privatized.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I have seen some of this speculation.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Where? Did you see it in the press?

Senator Olson: I have not heard it directly from anyone who has responsibility for leading or promoting any action such as that.

Senator Haidasz: As a supplementary question, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us the reasons for and the meaning of the change involving the two men in the top positions of Air Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am afraid I do not understand what my friend means by "the reasons for and the meaning of the change." I do not think that such information is normally given to explain any action that is taken when changes are made to personnel in leading positions.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Lowell Murray: Perhaps the minister could speak about another crown corporation and explain the appointment of the new chairman of the Canadian National Railways and her qualifications for that post.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe a press release was issued at the time of the appointment, which I am sure arrived on Senator Murray's desk.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Senator Murray was obviously not convinced by the press release.

Senator Olson: This falls into the same category as the answer I gave a moment ago.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I don't think he will be convinced by many more of them either.

Senator Flynn: I suppose we cannot comment on the press release.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—APPOINTMENT AND VACANCIES

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if, after these many months, he is now in a position to advise how soon all the positions on the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation will be filled.

I was very pleased to see that they have obtained a new chairman. This is a very good appointment.

Has the Leader of the Government any idea when the remainder of the positions on the board of directors will be filled and, if not, would he find out?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and renew my request to see if an answer can be obtained.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

KAHO'OLAWE ISLAND—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN ARMAMENT TESTING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie yesterday concerning the position of the government on the Canadian participation in the shelling of the Hawaiian Island of Kaho'olawe 'Ohana during joint exercises with the United States, Australia, New Zealand and Japan, known as RIMPAC.

Honourable senators, some of the countries participating in RIMPAC do not engage in the shelling of Kaho'olawe 'Ohana because their role in the exercise does not call for it. Canadian forces find it a valuable and a unique opportunity to practise a combined assault utilizing artillery cover. Principally inert ordnance will be used.

The Government of Canada considers the use of Kaho'olawe 'Ohana by the U. S. Navy for its own or joint exercise and training to be an issue of U.S.A. domestic concern.

The Government of Canada is also cognizant of the Federal District Court rulings of 1977 and 1980 recognizing U.S. Navy responsibility for the island subject to environmental and cultural safeguards with which the U.S. Navy has complied.

The Office of the Prime Minister and the Departments of External Affairs and National Defence have received representations from the "Protect Kaho'olawe 'Ohana" group and have met with the representatives of that organization during their recent visit to Canada.

Government officials are currently reviewing that information and will make recommendations at the appropriate time.

• (1440)

I did not have an answer yesterday to the latter part of the question, but I am sure that Senator Macquarrie will recognize that the first part of the answer is essentially in accordance with what I said in reply yesterday.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: I liked the last part better.

Senator Olson: It was extremely informative.

7 June 1984

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Brian Dickson, Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 7th day of June, 1984, at 4.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be
Sir,

Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate

Ottawa

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Brian Dickson, Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to inform you that Her Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under her Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Right Honourable Robert George Brian Dickson, Chief Justice of Canada, her Deputy, to do in Her Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during Her Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk of the Senate.

The Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act (Bill C-23 Chapter No. 7)

An Act to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act (Bill C-4 Chapter No. 8)

An Act to amend the Currency and Exchange Act (Bill C-11 Chapter No. 9)

An Act to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act (Bill C-44, Chapter No. 10)

An Act to implement a treaty between Canada and the United States relating to the Skagit River and Ross Lake, and the Seven Mile Reservoir on the Pend d'Oreille River (Bill C-41, Chapter No. 11)

An Act to establish the Asia-Pacific Foundation of Canada (Bill C-42 Chapter No. 12)

An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977 (Bill C-12 Chapter No. 13)

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Hull (Bill C-205 Chapter No. 14)

An Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act (Bill C-241 Chapter No. 15)

The Honourable Lloyd Francis, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1985 (Bill C-45 Chapter No. 16)

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MOTION FOR THE APPOINTMENT OF MR. D'IBERVILLE
FORTIER—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move:

That, in accordance with section 19 of An Act respecting the status of the official languages of Canada, Chapter 0-2, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, this House approves the appointment of D'Iberville Fortier, Esquire, as Commissioner of Official Languages of Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 12, 1984 at 2 p.m.

---

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 12, 1984

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CREE-NASKAPI (OF QUEBEC) BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-46, respecting certain provisions of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement and the Northeastern Quebec Agreement relating principally to Cree and Naskapi local government and to the land regime governing Category 1A and Category 1A-N land.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-39, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE OFFSHORE APPLICATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 12, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred Bill C-16, intituled: "An Act to apply the customs and excise jurisdiction of Canada to the continental shelf of Canada and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, May 31, 1984, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. BARROW,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Hon. Earl A. Hastings, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT PROPOSALS

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 12, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TWELFTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred the document intituled: "Proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Statutes of Canada", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, March 27, 1984, examined the said document and now reports it with the following amendments:

Proposed Clause 14:

Delete proposed sub-clauses 14(2) and (3).

Proposed Clause 18:

Delete the word "or" in line 12 on page 15; strike out the words "shareholder thereof." in line 19 and replace them with the words "shareholder thereof; or"; and add the following as paragraph (e):

"(e) a corporation, without share capital, having as its primary object the furtherance of any national, patriotic, philanthropic, medical, educational, scientific, artistic, social, fraternal, sporting or athletic purpose, no part of the income of which is payable to or otherwise available for the personal gain or benefit of any proprietor, member or shareholder thereof."

Proposed Clause 26:

Renumber sub-clauses 26(1) and (2) on page 21 as paragraphs (3) and (4) respectively, and add the following as new sub-clauses 26(1) and 26(2) respectively:

(1) Subsection 4(2) of the Canada Evidence Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) The wife or husband of a person charged with an offence against subsection 50(1) of the Young Offenders Act or with an offence against any of sections 146, 150 to 155, 157, 166 to 169, 175, 195, 197, 200, 246.1, 246.2, 246.3, 249 to 250.2, 255 to 258 or 289 of the Criminal Code, or an attempt to commit any such offence, is a competent and compellable witness for the prosecution without the consent of the person charged."

(2) Subsection (1) is deemed to have come into force on April 2, 1984.

Proposed Clauses 57 and 70:

Proposed clauses 57 and 70 should be amended in accordance with the undertaking given by the Chief Legislative Counsel of the Department of Justice to the Committee on May 24, 1984.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN NEIMAN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Neiman moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Neiman.]

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT—JOB CREATION PROGRAMS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. For some time there has been unrest among youth, both in Quebec and across Canada, because young people want to work and cannot find jobs. The Minister of State responsible for Youth has revealed that at least 800,000 young people are looking for jobs, either to earn a living or to earn the money they need to continue their education.

It seems that the government has earmarked substantial funding for projects that are to be carried out within the next few months.

To help these 800,000 young people who need jobs and who need an income, could the government perhaps implement these projects right away instead of waiting until election time?

[English]

● (1410)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): The fact of the matter is that the government and its ministers responsible for the various programs and, indeed, the various regions, are not withholding funds for purposes described by Senator Asselin. In fact, for many of the programs as much as 90 to 95 per cent of the funds for the whole fiscal year—of which only three of the twelve months have past—have been committed already, though they may not have been spent. Therefore, the basis on which the question was put is not valid. I am not sure what that does to the question. I suppose that it makes it invalid, too. In any event, we know that these programs are not capable of totally relieving the situation because it is always sad when there are people who wish to work and are unable to find jobs.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. Of course my honourable friend will never admit these funds will be released as soon as an election campaign is announced. We in the opposition are keeping a close watch on the situation and will certainly try to remind the Honourable Leader of the Government when the announcements are made. The fact remains that the government established a Ministry of State for Youth, which was a splendid thing for young Canadians.

In the Senate, it was decided to set up a Special Committee on Youth. I would like to know what projects the Minister of State for Youth, Mrs. Hervieux-Payette, is preparing or is going to announce for young Canadians?

I would also like to know whether the chairman of the Special Committee on Youth could inform us if his agenda is ready and if there are any major programs to help young people.

The chairman of the committee has told us that the problems of our young people are very serious. To provide our young people with some glimmer of hope, could the Chairman of the Special Committee on Youth inform us—after the statement I am expecting from the Leader of the Government—what projects the Minister of State for Youth has to offer our Canadian young people?

[English]

Senator Olson: It is impossible to give an answer to what it is that is going to be unblocked when nothing has been blocked.

Senator Asselin: Why don't you just say that you have nothing to say?

Senator Olson: Your question is based on a wrong premise and the preamble to your question is inaccurate.

Senator Asselin: That is the formula you always use to avoid giving an answer.

Senator Olson: I am not trying to avoid answering your question. The honourable senator could enlighten himself considerably on a number of the programs if he were to read yesterday's House of Commons Hansard, wherein he will find that the Prime Minister, upon being asked essentially the same question, went over a number of programs indicating the amount—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Why don't you do so yourself?

Senator Olson: I can repeat the answer here, if you like, but the House of Commons Hansard would have arrived at my honourable friend's mailbox or office earlier today. Of course, if he chooses not to read the answers made available to him, then I guess he is really more interested in asking a question than in getting an answer.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I note that the Leader of the Government is unable to answer my questions and that the government has no immediate plans to help Canadian youth.

[English]

Senator Olson: No, the truth is the minister gave him a very direct and accurate answer to his question.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Asselin for having made some very apt comments, which were, in fact, very similar to the ones I made myself in support of establishing a Special Senate Committee.

Senator Asselin realizes that our young people have a very serious problem and that we must all—

Senator Asselin: On a point of order. I have never denied the merits of this objective but I objected to the formula you wanted to use to find solutions to the youth problem.

Senator Hébert: I never said anything about denying. I said you were putting forward fresh arguments to support this objective, and that I was grateful to you for doing so.

I do not quite understand your question. I do not see how, after only a few weeks, a Special Senate Committee on Youth could offer a solution. I would like to inform Senator Asselin—although his colleague Senator Yuzyk could have done so as well—that we have already made considerable progress. We have had three committee meetings within the last few weeks, and last Saturday an ad was published in 155 Canadian newspapers, inviting Canadians to submit briefs.

We have already received dozens of telephone calls from interested parties. However, we have not yet reached the stage where we can propose solutions, and I am sure Senator Asselin will understand.

[English]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if in future he will refuse to reply to any questions which have already been put in the other place and answered there. Is that the position he now takes?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, he does not take that position at all. I would be very happy to get out the Hansard of the other place—

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Olson: —and reply to the question which was asked.

Senator Asselin: Answer it yourself.

Senator Olson: It has been drawn to my attention that reading long passages out of the House of Commons Hansard is not a good practice to follow in this chamber. It is a practice which has been objected to many times, which is why it is one I do not follow. The Leader of the Opposition can surely understand that.

If I were to refer essentially the same question to the ministers responsible then they would very likely give the same answer as the Prime Minister would give in the other place. That is a practice consistent with what we have displayed in this chamber for a long time. The honourable senator objects to my reading answers out of Hansard of the other place. However, if I were to wait a couple of days, give an undertaking that I would refer the question, then he would be likely to receive exactly the same answer which was given anyway.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have never made the type of objection which the Leader of the Government raises. He thinks he understands Beauchesne; however, I have told him on previous occasions that he does not. I would not make a silly objection such as the one he has suggested.

Senator Olson: I did not say that he would; although I do not think the objection was silly. If it will satisfy the Leader of the Opposition I will reply to the question by repeating the answer as reported in the House of Commons Hansard.

Senator Asselin: Give your own answer. Do you have one?

Senator Olson: I suppose the question is whether he would like it now or not. On page 4526—

Senator Asselin: I can read that answer myself. I want to have your own answer.

Senator Olson: No, you do not want my answer.

Senator Asselin: Yes, I want your answer. You do not have one.

Senator Olson: If I were to give my own answer you would say, "You are speaking for the government; we want to know what the position of the government is." It seems to me that when the Right Honourable the Prime Minister gives an answer which is printed in Hansard then that should be adequate. The honourable senator is being very inconsistent with respect to what he has asked in the past. If honourable senators opposite want the answer to be read then I will read it.

Senator Asselin: That is the way you answer a question when you do not know the answer.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE VISIT OF MR. CHEDLI KLIBI, SECRETARY-GENERAL OF THE ARAB LEAGUE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government and I shall try and keep Beauchesne out of it. It is based upon a most impeccable premise, a communiqué from the Department of External Affairs. The communiqué, however, is a bit late and I do not know whether that is to be charged to the mailing practices of the Department of External Affairs or to Canada Post. This is an expression I use, which indicates that you change a name faster than you can change a practice.

• (1420)

Not long ago, one of our three foreign ministers, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, the Minister of External Relations, was in Tunisia where he is well-regarded—and in my judgment, deservedly. During that visit he had conversations with Mr. Chedli Klibi, the Secretary-General of the Arab League, in which they discussed important world matters. I am prompted to ask the minister if, since that meeting, there has been any indication as to when the Secretary-General will be invited to Canada for a formal visit, a visit which has been discussed for a good many months.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know whether or not an invitation has been extended. However, there has been an indication that an invitation would be extended to Mr. Klibi to visit Canada, and I will make inquiries to find out whether or not anything more has been decided on that visit.

CANADIAN SPORTS POOL CORPORATION

SALE OF TICKETS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer which is in response to a question asked by Senator Flynn on June 7, 1984, concerning a mandate given by the Canada Sports Pool Corporation to Canada Post to sell sports pool tickets. The answer is that negotiations have been going on for some time between the Sports Pool Corporation and Canada Post concerning the sale of sports pool tickets.

Canada Post has agreed to use the province of Alberta as a test area for the selling of sports pool tickets since that province will benefit the most from the sale of the tickets. If this trial is successful, then the Sports Pool Corporation hopes to be able to expand ticket sales to other provinces through Canada Post.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

NORTHEAST COAL DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): The second delayed answer is in reply to a question by Senator Muir on April 17, 1984 with respect to government assistance to the Northeast British Columbia Coal project. First of all, it is a very long answer and I would like permission for that answer to be taken as read. I must explain that it is a supplementary answer to the answer I gave a few days ago, and at that time there was an indication that there would be a supplementary answer filling in more detail.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In response to the Honourable Robert Muir's question as to how much public money has been expended to assist the Northeast B.C. Coal project both directly and indirectly insofar as roads, railways and ports are concerned, the following summarizes the federal government contributions.

—Ridley Island Coal Terminal. The federal government gave Ports Canada $50 million to develop the port infrastructure and $23 million as Ports Canada's share of the equity in Ridley Terminals Inc., a joint venture with Federal Commerce and Navigation to build and operate the coal handling facility. To facilitate the building of the coal handling facilities the government agreed to guarantee loans of up to $205 million to RTI. The federal government share of the cost of an access road to Ridley Island will be $4.8 million.

—CN Rail Upgrading. While the government will make no direct contribution to the upgrading of CN's north line, the Crown Corporation has spent about $250 million to date on improvements and equipment required for the shipment of coal, and has scheduled another $112 million to be spent in 1984.

—British Columbia Railway. The government (with grants of $2.5, $2.0 and $0.5 million from Energy, Mines and Resources, Transport Canada and Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, respectively, for the design, engineering and construction of a prototype electronic locomotive) assisted in the electrification of BCR's Anzac line into the northeast development.

With regard to the senator's supplementary question relating to employment, foreign exchange earnings and contract guarantees, the following is the relevant information.

- Employment. Total construction employment rose from 1400 in 1981 to a peak of 6855 in 1983. Translated into person-years of construction employment, total employment for the Northeast B.C. Coal Developments will be 13,090 by the time everything is completed in 1985. Direct operating employment will be 2230, comprising 95 at Ridley Terminals, 95 and 50 new jobs respectively at Canadian National Railways and British Columbia Railways, 490 at the Bullmoose Mine, and 1500 at Quintette.
- Foreign Exchange. When the mines are in full production, shipping 6.6 million tonnes to Japan, foreign exchange earnings are expected to be in the order of $600 million per year.
- Guarantees Regarding Minimum Quantities and Price. The government has no guarantees from the Japanese concerning minimum quantities and price. Shipments are governed by commercial contracts between private sector companies. We have, however, every expectation that the Japanese will honour their contracts, as this is clearly in their long-term interest, both in terms of secure coal supplies and in terms of protecting the quite significant investment in equity and lending that they have in this project.

CREE-NASKAPI (OF QUEBEC) BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Charlie Watt moved second reading of Bill C-46, respecting certain provisions of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement and the Northeastern Quebec Agreement relating principally to Cree and Naskapi local government and to the land regime governing Category 1A and Category 1A-N land.

He said: Honourable senators, it is with pleasure and anticipation that I speak to you today concerning the Cree-Naskapi bill. It is a unique occasion, for this legislation provides authority and responsibility to the Cree and Naskapi Indians of Quebec to determine their own forms of local government.

The assumption of these new powers is a fundamental change from the Indian Act, which has governed the Cree and Naskapi Indians for more than 100 years. My pleasure comes first from seeing the culmination of many years of dialogue and discussions held by those representing Canada and representatives of the Cree and Naskapi. These discussions and negotiations did not always go smoothly, but there were always specific goals to be reached. Everyone concerned made every effort to try a little harder, and to achieve the levels of understanding required to reach agreement.

The Cree-Naskapi bill was the result of this agreement. Much credit is due to all those who contributed to its production.

What does the bill entail? First of all, it is an extensive and comprehensive piece of legislation giving to the Cree and Naskapi of Quebec a great degree of independence and local control over their own lives and manner of living. The Cree and Naskapi, beneficiaries of the first modern land claims pacts—the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreements of 1975 and the Northeastern Quebec Agreement of 1978—very wisely insisted that legislation should be enacted to give them self-government. The bill I speak about today, therefore, flows from those agreements. Furthermore, the legislation now before us is consistent with the recommendations of the all-party parliamentary committee on Indian self-government in Canada as outlined in the committee's report released in November of 1983.

The special committee stated in that report that the Cree-Naskapi bill represents the aspirations of the two groups for self-government and should be proceeded with immediately. However, honourable senators, I must stress that this legislation is in no way a model for other self-government legislation; other Indian nations will be free to adopt any appropriate elements they choose. Although the legislation is not a model, it most certainly could become a bellwether in the future as the government continues with its new approaches and initiatives in the resolution of native issues. It is part of the commitment by the government to the revitalization of its relationship with the people. It is a positive indicator that this special relationship has been strengthened.

Honourable senators, I would, for a moment or two, like to outline some of the pertinent parts of Bill C-46. First of all, it affects approximately 8,500 Cree of Northern Quebec and 500 Naskapi of Schefferville. It will free them from the highly restrictive Indian Act. At the same time, it will change the role of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the day-to-day affairs of these people.

Under the Indian Act, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Governor in Council have direct control in such areas as the management and administration of Indian lands, Indian funds, band councils, personal property transactions, health, education and business.

Under the bill now before the chamber, the federal role will be substantially changed and reduced. In some cases there will be total Indian control of management and administration of Indian lands, money and band membership. The Indian Act will no longer apply to the Cree-Naskapi lands and they will be able to govern their land in the way they consider best for themselves.

A most interesting point is that the old Indian Act membership criteria as a basis for establishing political participation in Cree and Naskapi government will not apply. Membership will be granted under a provision proposed by the Cree and Naskapi, under the comprehensive agreements to which I alluded earlier.

Honourable senators, proper functioning of this act requires appropriate funding. I am pleased to state that provisions for proper accounting procedures have been incorporated in the bill and these procedures must be followed and adhered to by each Indian government. The bill also details the provisions for accountability of band governments to their membership. Thus, there will no longer be extensive control by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development over Cree and Naskapi funds.

This bill shows that the Government of Canada is giving concerted, spirited and dynamic consideration to the resolution of outstanding Indian issues. In a democratic way, as shown by the negotiations and discussions leading to the framing of the legislation, the government is supporting the integrity of the consensus-building process.

● (1430)

As I stated earlier, not only do I speak to this matter with pleasure but also with anticipation. That anticipation stems from the fact that we are taking part in a unique event. History is being made and we are part of it. Perhaps in the process of making history, we are returning to our native people their heritage of self-government.

I should like to read two quotations taken from the report of the Special Committee on Indian Self-government in Canada. The first is an excerpt from the opening statement made by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister at the 1983 First Ministers' Conference on aboriginal constitutional matters when he said, in part:

Clearly our aboriginal peoples each occupied a special place in history. To my way of thinking, this entitles them to special recognition in the Constitution and to their own place in Canadian society, distinct from each other and distinct from other groups, who together with them comprise the Canadian citizenry.

The committee endorsed the Prime Minister's remarks and then reported:

The committee further believes that special and distinct recognition can best be manifested by Indian First Nation governments having a unique place in the Canadian political system and the Constitution.

The Cree-Naskapi bill is part of that new relationship.

Literally years of hard and diligent work, the hopes and aspirations of the Cree and the Naskapi, a new era of financial, institutional and legislative relationships between the Indian people and the federal government are all a part of this bill. I firmly believe it deserves the support of all honourable senators and should be given prompt consideration.

Honourable senators, with regard to Bill C-46, the Cree, Naskapi and the Inuit have worked hard over the years. This bill represents one area that was not dealt with in 1975 when we finally wound up our negotiations with the Government of Quebec and the other provinces. This bill is directly related to an area that could change the Indian Act. At the time, the Indian Act was not an issue for amendment during the negotiations. Therefore, it was a matter that was not dealt with. Billy Diamond and I have worked side by side in trying to come up with a comprehensive agreement that all people will be able to live up to, including the Government of Canada and the governments of the various provinces.

I should like to stress that it is important when you pass this bill that the Government of Canada will live up to its obligations in this legislation. The financial obligations of the Province of Quebec and the government has been troublesome to us over the years, but we hope that this legislation will make it easier for the Crees and the Naskapi to be in agreement with the Government of Canada regarding their financial needs.

Honourable senators, the reason I have put forward a motion to set up a committee is that I feel that, from time to time, areas should be reviewed and studied by a committee such as the one I have proposed. I would also recommend that perhaps once every two years we review some of these comprehensive land claim settlements. The committee should also study and determine how we can arrive at acceptable solutions.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, our party had the opportunity in 1975 to work with my honourable friend Senator Watt in connection with the James Bay agreement.

[English]

After my discussions with Senator Watt, I was somewhat surprised to see him entering this chamber and being sworn in as a Liberal since I felt at the time of our discussions he was a real Conservative. When I asked him about this, after he had been sworn, he told me, "Senator, when we discussed the James Bay agreement with your party, I did not raise my flag then." I am somewhat surprised that I considered him to be a Conservative at that time.

I have no doubt, honourable senators, that the Senate will carefully study the bill before us. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the adjournment is moved, I should like to put some questions to Senator Watt. As sponsor of the bill does he wish the bill to be referred to a committee, namely, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which is the committee that studied the James Bay agreement some years ago?

Senator Watt: As honourable senators are aware, we are under some time constraints. I should like to see this legislation passed as quickly as possible, and therefore I would not suggest that it be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. As a matter of fact, I should like to have third reading take place today, if possible.

Senator Asselin: Today?

Senator Flynn: Does Senator Watt know if any group or band has raised any objection to this bill? He will remember that when we considered and studied the James Bay Agreement bill, as drafted, some groups or bands were affected by it.

I have read the bill very quickly since it is quite an extensive document. It is difficult to be able to assess whether any third party is affected by this bill except, perhaps, where there is mention of the right of access to the lands that are to be under the authority of the bands. Does Senator Watt know of any group or band which may be affected by this bill?

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, to my knowledge no groups or bands are affected by this bill. As I mentioned in my speech, this bill deals with matters which were left over from the signing of the James Bay Agreement in 1975. Therefore, this bill is directly related to Category IA lands and in no way affects other groups. As far as I am aware, there is no other group that is opposed to the legislation.

● (1440)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Does the honourable senator mean to say that there is no group other than the Cree or the Naskapi, who we know support it, that opposes the legislation?

Senator Watt: Keeping in mind that the Cree and the Naskapi support the bill, as far as I am aware there are no dissenting groups. All are in favour of this bill. They have worked hard for it and they would like it to receive third reading and to be passed today.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I hope this will be my last question—I say “I hope” because, on previous occasions when someone has said that, the question was only the first of a series of many.

My question concerns the authority left in the Province of Quebec over this legislation and over the territory concerned. Because I see many references to the laws of Quebec in this bill, I wonder whether it has received the approval, in one form or another, of, let us say, the Quebec government or legislature.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, during past negotiations with the Government of Quebec and the Government of Canada—and I can speak with confidence because I was directly involved in them—the Government of Quebec approved not only the notion but the letters patent and records pertaining to Category 1A land, which would be considered as reserve land under the federal Crown, which land would therefore be the responsibility of the Government of Canada. During the signing of the James Bay Agreement, the Government of Quebec had already given its blessing to it.

Senator Flynn: Thank you.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to adjourn the debate but, in doing so, I am not committing myself to the idea that this bill should not go to the appropriate committee of the Senate. It might be desirable to send it to committee in order to hear the views of the officials of the department.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved the second reading of Bill C-39, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my pleasure to present these amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. The Senate has always been a guardian of veterans' rights and I am sure this chamber will support legislation providing aid and comfort to veterans and their families both now and far into the future. Strictly speaking, these amendments deal exclusively with war veterans and civilian war allowances, but they also contain the key by which the Department of Veterans Affairs will be able to expand greatly its most important new initiative of recent years—the aging veterans program.

The purposes of this program have been widely praised by honourable senators on both sides of the Senate. It has been so successful in its first three years that they and others have urged the government to extend its services to more veterans. The government agrees with this view and this is why it is proposing to enlarge dramatically the aging veterans program. This legislation is the means to this satisfactory end.

Honourable senators, with your indulgence, I will deal with the future of the aging veterans program later in my speech, but I can say now that approval of the amendments allowing the harmonization of the War Veterans Allowance program and the Old Age Security and Guaranteed Income Supplement programs will provide the human resources needed to propel the aging veterans program forward with the maximum efficiency.

First, however, I am happy to tell honourable senators that this legislation will also bring immediate financial help directly to over 50,000 allowance recipients. Proposed benefit increases will lift recipients under the age of 65 to the same federal government support plateau as their older colleagues. Honourable senators will know that for the past few years, allowance recipients old enough to qualify for Old Age Security, the Guaranteed Income Supplement and an allowance “top up” have been receiving more in total federal benefits than those under age 65. This was not in keeping with the long-standing spirit behind the allowance program. In 1980, therefore, Parliament acted to eliminate this imbalance. Bill C-40 was passed, including an amendment to raise allowance payments annually to those under age 65. That bill would have done away with the differential for those over and under age 65 on April 1, 1986.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs is now proposing to bring immediate parity. It is proposed that, on July 1 of this year single recipients under the age of 65 shall receive an extra $20 a month, and married recipients in the same age bracket a further $25 a month.

Honourable senators, it will cost the government an additional $16.8 million to achieve total equity well ahead of schedule, but I am sure we will not begrudge extra help for a most deserving group. There are 26,000 single recipients under the age of 65, including 13,000 widows, and the allowance increase represents their second income boost from the federal government this year.

In addition to the benefits of the proposed legislation directly affecting allowance recipients mentioned above, honourable senators will realize that a proposal in the last budget recommended raising the singles' rate of guaranteed income supplement by up to $50 a month in 1984. All such guaranteed income supplement increases are now automatically given to those receiving veterans allowances. This also means that over 51,000 single allowance recipients—representing over 60 per cent of the total allowance recipients—will receive a further $50 a month in federal government support. The Department of Veterans Affairs will spend an additional $10 million annually for increased benefits for 26,000 single recipients under age 65. The Department of Health and Welfare will pay a similar amount for 25,000 single war veterans allowance recipients over age 65 who receive Old Age Security and Guaranteed Income Supplements.

This legislation further eliminates a number of the inconsistencies and inequities that have emerged in the administration of War Veterans Allowances and Civilian War Allowances. I will deal with two of these measures before turning to the crucial harmonization proposals. First, there is the amendment to give merchant seamen who served on vessels in Korean waters during 1950-53 the same right to civilian war allowances as those merchant seamen who served in dangerous waters in the First and Second World Wars. In all other veterans' matters, honourable senators, the three wars are considered identical in terms of eligibility for veterans' benefits. It is only just that merchant seamen who served in Korean waters should receive similar recognition. The numbers involved will not be great, but this amendment shows that our country is reconfirming its gratitude to all those Canadians who went to the aid of the United Nations peacekeeping forces.

Another welcome amendment will place the Bureau of Pension Advocates at the service of war veterans allowance recipients. The bureau presently provides a free counselling service under the Pension Act. Its advocates help veterans prepare applications and represent them at hearings. Until now, no such free system has been available to war veterans allowance recipients, but this amendment will allow them to receive free legal advice and assistance for their appeals to the War Veterans Allowance Board. There are the occasional complaints levelled against decisions made by the agencies handling veterans' benefits, but with pensions, veterans enjoy free counselling and unlimited appeal opportunities; this amendment can only reinforce our reputation for fairness in dealing with appeals.

I will now explain the need to harmonize the war veterans allowance program with the support programs administered by the Department of Health and Welfare. As most honourable senators are aware, war veterans allowance is an income-tested program available to qualified veterans, their widows and dependents. What it means, in effect, is that needy veterans do not have to wait until age 65 before they receive federal government income support. Last year the Department of Veterans Affairs distributed nearly $422 million to 88,000 recipients of war veterans allowances and civilian war allowances. The Department of Health and Welfare is far and away the main economic provider once war veterans allowance recipients reach the age of 65; in fact, up to 90 per cent of a recipient's income flows from the Old Age Security/Guaranteed Income Supplement program, with war veterans allowance contributing a small "top up" for the neediest group.

[Senator Godfrey.]

● (1450)

Soon the majority of recipients will be over the age of 65, and by 1991 it is calculated that the Veterans Affairs contribution to War Veterans Allowances and Civilian War Allowances will drop from the present level of $35 million a month to $9 million a month.

At the same time, the role of Veterans Affairs has been changing as veterans have been getting older. As the pressure for War Veterans Allowance and Civilian War Allowance income support is easing, so has the need for social and health assistance increased.

The harmonization proposals before you, honourable senators, recognize this reality. The reason and the opportunity to act have arrived simultaneously.

As I said a moment ago, the Department of National Health and Welfare is the prime financial provider once a WVA recipient becomes 65 and, naturally, veterans have to supply financial information to the OAS/GIS administration once a year. However, at the same time, they have to fill in separate forms for the benefit of the Department of Veterans Affairs, even though both departments require virtually the same information.

These amendments will eliminate one of the steps. As from May, 1986, WVA recipients over age 65 will no longer have to provide income information to Veterans Affairs. There will be one less form to fill in, less government intervention in elderly veterans' lives and a more modern, streamlined process.

What will start happening in 1986 is that Health and Welfare will collect the annual financial information from those veterans in receipt of WVA and OAS/GIS benefits and transfer the data to the WVA Program by means of a simple computer-tape transfer. As a result, Veterans Affairs will continue to distribute WVA cheques but will be relieved of a time-consuming administrative procedure.

In addition, the special link all veterans have with their own department will remain unbroken. Veterans Affairs will continue to decide on service eligibility. The special advantages available under WVA—interest income and casual earnings exemptions—will remain. The War Veterans Allowance Board will continue its present role of hearing appeals, reviewing decisions and interpreting the acts and regulations.

To facilitate harmonization, WVA will be adopting some OAS/GIS income-testing procedures. This, too, will be a blessing to many WVA recipients. At present, the WVA Program calculates benefits on the basis of a veteran's current-year income. By adopting the simpler GIS practice of using the previous calendar year's income as the foundation for calculation, more than $3 million in benefits will go to 25,000 WVA recipients each year.

WVA recipients under the age of 65 will continue to deal exclusively with Veterans Affairs, but they too will be able to take advantage of the new and simplified income-calculating method.

An important objective of this change is to free up the human resources needed to organize and deliver an extended Aging Veterans' Program. These harmonization proposals will mean a reduction of 187 person-years by 1989, which can be diverted to a more challenging and constructive role in serving older veterans.

Just let me remind honourable senators what the Aging Veterans Program sets out to accomplish. Basically, its purpose is to help an elderly veteran stay at home in dignity and comfort; it is a more humane and less expensive alternative to institutionalization in old age.

The program offers a variety of services, all designed to assist veterans to cope with the problems of everyday living that sometimes accompany advancing age. This can mean the hiring of a physiotherapist or a home helper. It can mean helping a veteran attend a day hospital so he can return home at night. Assistance can also take the form of grounds-keeping and house-cleaning. For those in wheelchairs, the construction of a ramp can mean the difference between a life at home and permanent institutionalization. The great strength of the program, honourable senators, is that it is able to tailor the services to individual needs. That is why it is crucial for Veterans Affairs to have the counsellors and health experts available to advise individuals.

There have been many cases where the objectives of the Aging Veterans Program have been achieved with the expenditure of time alone. Counsellors have done the legwork for veterans and seen that services already available in the community were put to the use of their clients. Such an intermediary, liaison role is vital to the success of the program.

Honourable senators, let me now tell you how the extension will be developed. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has announced that the program is going to be opened up to more veterans in the following four stages:

On October 1, 1984, it will be available to war-disabled veterans 65 and over who also receive War Veterans Allowance, and those WVA recipients 75 and over. On January 1, 1986, all remaining WVA recipients aged between 65 and 74 will become eligible to apply. On January 1, 1987, war disabled veterans 65 years and over who are precluded from receiving WVA due to the fact that their total income including OAS exceeds the income levels set under the War Veterans Allowance Act will be covered. On January 1, 1988, non-pensioned veterans, with theatre of war service, 65 years and older, where, together with other income, OAS payments prevent them from receiving WVA, will be eligible.

Not only will the program embrace a far greater number of veterans, but the quality of the services is also being upgraded. In particular, transportation will be part of the package for the first time. Transportation may be covered for up to $600 a year for eligible veterans so that they are not "shut-ins" but can make the necessary trips to the bank or supermarket.

These changes are not only ambitious and far-reaching, but they also represent sound economic common sense.

The soaring cost of hospital care dominates every discussion of Canada's health system. There has been a chorus of concern over the expense of maintaining long-term care beds. Fuelling this concern is the prospect of a large percentage of our population reaching an age when they will be most vulnerable to health problems. Canada already has one of the highest rates of institutionalization of senior citizens in the Western world even though studies show that a goodly number of those in hospitals and nursing homes are admitted for social rather than medical reasons.

Of course, the majority of the aged remain functionally well all their days and have no need of assistance; and, of course, there are some for whom the hospital or nursing home is the only answer. However, the Aging Veterans Program seeks to help those who are not in these groups; those who will be best served if they can be helped to live independent and useful lives in their own familiar surroundings.

Honourable senators, I suggest that this program is a thoughtful and humane solution to a growing problem. In sheer economic terms alone it is desirable. The Department of Veterans Affairs expects that the program in 1989 will be supporting 14,000 veterans at a cost of $57 million. The same sum spent on financing long-term hospital care would help just 1,300 veterans.

So, honourable senators, we are being asked today to reinforce a program that is economically prudent and psychologically stimulating. It is an irresistible combination.

There can be no doubt that this program will be monitored by gerontologists and health care specialists. It is to be hoped that it will provide knowledge and inspiration for a new, universal approach to the challenge of an aging population. This will be in keeping with the past. Many of the great social advances in Canada were first developed for veterans. Over the past 60 years, veterans' benefits have anticipated such generally accepted social innovations as disability pensions, OAS/GIS benefits, Family Allowances, subsidized post-secondary education and public medical insurance.

Honourable senators, by adopting these amendments and strengthening the Aging Veterans Program, we will be upholding a worthy and responsible tradition.

On motion of Senator Roblin, for Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MOTION FOR THE APPOINTMENT OF MR. D'IBERVILLE FORTIER

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Petten, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau:

That, in accordance with section 19 of An Act respecting the status of the official languages of Canada, Chapter 0-2, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, this House approves the appointment of D'Iberville Fortier, Esquire, as Commissioner of Official Languages of Canada.—
(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Murray adjourned, rather than debate, the consideration of this motion because several senators had not been given notice of the government's intention to appoint Mr. D'Iberville Fortier as Commissioner of Official Languages.

First of all, I would like to express our appreciation to the retiring Commissioner, Mr. Yalden, for the excellent work he has accomplished. Generally speaking, I believe that during his years he had the co-operation and approval of all those with whom he had to work. It is not an easy task, it is an extremely delicate one and will continue to be so. I therefore extend our appreciation to Mr. Yalden.

Mr. D'Iberville Fortier has had a career which is a guarantee of his competence; we want to assure him of our fullest co-operation and say to him that we endorse the decision of the government without reservation.

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the government I would like to say how enthusiastically we share Senator Flynn's comments about the present commissioner, Max Yalden. As honourable senators may or may not know, before I came to the Senate I was legal adviser to Mr. Yalden's predecessor, Keith Spicer, who was the first Commissioner of Official Languages. I heartily agree with Senator Flynn that Mr. Yalden has given seven very valuable and important years of service to his country in this post and to, if I may call it so, the cause of bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada and I add the government's thanks for what he has done for us. As for Mr. Fortier, as Senator Flynn has said, he has had a very distinguished career in the foreign service, having started in the early 1950s with the Department of External Affairs and having served in three or four posts as ambassador. So he brings with him a great deal of experience and promise for continuation of valuable service in this very important position in Canada.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—
DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate, tabled in the Senate on January 31, 1984—
(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order stands in the name of Senator Macdonald. I have just been advised that Senator Stollery would like to speak to it now. I believe that when Senator Macdonald adjourned the debate he indicated he would be glad to yield to anyone who wished to speak, so Senator Stollery will speak to this order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I shall be as brief as possible but I should like to give you a few of my thoughts on this important question of Senate reform. First, I would remind honourable senators that when we talk about Senate reform we are talking about a fundamental change in our system of parliamentary government. I think that in the rhetoric about an elected Senate or a non-elected Senate we have lost sight of the fact that we are talking about the Parliament of Canada. The system of government in Canada involves three parts: the Crown, the Senate and the House of Commons. I suppose, in the case of Canada, because of the weakness in the parliamentary system of the two houses, we have developed a fourth element, the provincial premiers.

When I came to the Senate a few years ago, I had not given a great deal of thought to how government was constituted in Canada, in spite of the fact that I had already spent some nine years in the House of Commons. I do not know why we continue to use that silly sophomoric reference to "the other place." In any event, I had very little contact with this part of the Parliament of Canada, even though only a few hundred feet separate the two chambers. After coming to the Senate and reading the proposals for Senate reform, it struck me that honourable senators seem to be caught up in a rather useless, sterile debate. We have been persuaded that we are criticised because the Senate is non-elected or because some people think we have too good a job and resent the fact that we are senators. Somehow life was given to all this and people began reacting. This reaction is something I find difficult to follow. The idea seemed to be that the answer to the problem of Senate reform—taken in isolation from the fact that the Senate is part of the Parliament of Canada, which is an element you cannot isolate—was to be found in Australia. This was about two years ago. I say this with respect and not in an unpleasantly critical manner but, personally, I would have taken Australia as almost the last example of how a two-chamber system should function.

As I looked into the subject and read reports and all kinds of books on constitutions, one point came through clearly and that was that the larger the geography of the country—particularly countries of the new world and of a western European tradition—the more likely the tendency to have a second chamber to protect regional interests. All kinds of schemes have been tried to make the bicameral system work. It reminds me of the plethora of liquor jurisdictions with all kinds of funny rules that one finds around. In France the second chamber is elected by Les Grands Électeurs, who represent local interests. Most Frenchmen have no understanding of how senators are elected in France, certainly none that I have ever met other than senators themselves or those who are directly involved in elections. The situation in Australia was resolved by developing a system which resulted in an impasse a few years ago when the Governor General had to leave the country and, as far as I know, has been unable to go back.

I do not understand why we would allow ourselves to become involved in just one more half measure to reform Parliament. Changing the Senate will not reform Parliament. It is clear to me that what we need in Canada is a complete reform of our parliamentary system. Tinkering around with the system, which in my opinion the report does, and suggesting, for example, that a person should run for office for a nine-year period and, being successful, accept a situation where he is limited as to what he can do, does not make any sense at all. It is absolutely one of the craziest ideas I have ever heard in my life. I cannot imagine why anyone would run for office in a house of Parliament that has limitations which the other elective body does not have. It just does not make any sense to me.

• (1510)

Brazil, Australia, France and Nigeria—all of them large countries—have incomprehensible methods of making up their upper chambers, because they try to resolve the unresolvable. They say that the two chambers should be elected, but that one chamber cannot have as many powers as the other because that would create an impasse. What follows, then, is not logical and it usually does not work. In most of these countries people do not understand how the second chamber comes to be elected, and the system does not work because, in my view, the people do not approach the fundamental question of reform.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that the only large country where the bicameral system functions properly is the United States. It does not work in Australia, and it certainly does not work in Nigeria. It works to some degree in France because that country is relatively small and does not have provincial governments and the senators actually represent local interests at the centre.

Everyone says our system does not work in Canada, that the Senate has not been as useful as it might be. Presumably, that is the purpose of all these reports and meetings which have gone on ad nauseam. This has engendered a feeling of embarrassment on the part of senators for having their jobs. This is why they go to Australia to study their system or appoint committees to deal with the subject. As has been mentioned here, when members of these committees speak to you privately they say that the Senate should be left as it is, but they are too embarrassed to say that publicly. Everyone knows that is what has happened.

In my view, we need to reform the entire system of government in Canada. It needs to be updated. Honourable senators and others seem to have forgotten that the most fundamental change to take place around here in years was the changing of the rules of the House of Commons. When it was decided two years ago that the House of Commons would not sit after 6 o'clock, the entire dynamics of politics in this country were changed. In my opinion, it was a bad change. Politics don't stop in the evening. I don't think the job of politics is one from which a politician goes home at 6 o'clock. I think that change was a damaging one to our political system.

I find it absolutely silly to propose that under the current parliamentary system the Senate should be an elected body with a number of funny rules that would limit the power of senators. I cannot think of anything sillier. Why go to countries like Australia, which have derived their parliamentary system from Westminster, when the only bicameral parliamentary system that actually works is that of the United States?

The United States is the only country in the world where there are two elected chambers, both of which have nearly equal power. At least, they are elected nowadays; there was a time when they were not. The American system works not too badly and it fits the definitions we seem to be looking for. I do not understand the hesitation in looking at the American congressional system and seeing where it can be adapted to Canada. Why do we have to go to Australia, Nigeria or Brazil? We could go to China and look at their system. China is a country of many provinces with problems of regional governments. Why do we not take the obvious route and look at a country which is close to us in order to find what parts of its system can be adapted to Canada and to Canadians?

As I said in my opening comments, in Canada we have the Crown, the Senate and the House of Commons, but, unfortunately, in my opinion, we have developed a system of federal-provincial conferences. When I look at the information and the facts I ask myself why we are not addressing ourselves to the question of the Crown.

I come from Toronto and have a perfectly average Anglo-Saxon background. I suppose I was a royalist; my family certainly comes from that tradition. However, I must say that now in 1984 it seems appropriate to me for us to start discussing when we will have a Canadian head of state. I cannot get too excited over the rather obscure and arcane discussion of second chambers when our head of state is not even a Canadian. The head of state is something we should start talking about. We all know that it is an area in which any change will take a long time to bring about. However, I cannot see why we should not get Canadians thinking about it. Eventually, we will have to have a Canadian head of state.

I have reason to wonder whether the Westminster parliamentary system is working now in Canada. I do not think it is. If it were, then governments, ministers and prime ministers would not be spending so much of their time at federal-provincial conferences dealing with their provincial confrères trying to resolve problems which are not being resolved in Parliament. Apparently, Parliament is not representing these regional interests at the centre. It is true we are not representing these interests as we should be. I think we all agree on that.

Honourable senators, I suppose that the point being made is that if Parliament stays the way it is now the worst thing we could do is create an elected Senate. That is the last thing we should be doing. The best thing we can do is leave the Senate the way it is. If we elect the Senate and think that it will not radically change the dynamics of Parliament, then we are simply dreaming. It will change fundamentally the dynamics of Parliament.

I can assure honourable senators that if we had an elected Senate in Canada and I decided to run and was elected, if someone said that I could not initiate certain types of legislation or that I could not do this or that, it would be a frosty Friday during my first nine years before I would accept something like that.

Having said that, I believe that the Senate should exercise its right of veto. I think the Senate should challenge the government of the day. Even as the Senate is constituted right now, I think it can be more effective than it is. It is not effective because most of us do not want to challenge the government of the day. We should. In fact, it is our constitutional duty to do so. Whether we will challenge the government of the day or not is another story.

● (1520)

However, as far as electing the Senate is concerned, in my opinion that would be an absolute disaster. I read Mr. Gordon Robertson's opinion, for instance, as to how he thought the Senate should be constituted and it did not make any sense to me at all. He was obviously a man who had no idea of the dynamics of Parliament.

As I have said, by having the House of Commons adjourn at 6 o'clock each day this building has been turned into a desert after that hour. Nothing happens in this building after 6 o'clock. The theory that committees will meet and that the evening hours will give everyone time to carry out other duties is not borne out. Everyone knows that, after 6 p.m., this building is dark and dim. The library is closed; everything is closed. There is no one in the building except a few senators who are still at a meeting of one of our committees.

It seems to me that the basic problem stares you in the face, and that problem is one of parliamentary reform. By that, I do not mean just fiddling around and winding up with something that is, perhaps, worse than what you started with. It means, first of all, that we have to deal with the head-of-state issue and, in that regard, I would say that senators are probably in a better position than are elected members to discuss and deal with this aspect of the problem.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Maybe we should elect the Queen!

Senator Stollery: Perhaps we should. I would have said that the Head of State should probably be the Governor General.

[Senator Stollery.]

Secondly, I do not know why we adhere to the Westminster system, since that system could never possibly adapt itself to a country with the large geographic area that Canada has. Instead of running around, looking at, basically, broken down parliamentary systems, I am wondering why we do not look at the only system, as I see it, that seems to work with an elected Senate and an elected House of Commons, and that is the congressional system as it has evolved in the United States over the last 100 years since the Civil War. In my opinion, that is the system that we should be looking at to see what parts of it would be suitable to Canada, which has very similar geographic and regional problems. In that case, that would allow us to elect the House of Commons and to elect the Senate. Under those conditions, and those conditions only would I ever support the idea of an elected Senate. Thank you, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES OF CANADA

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Aboriginal Peoples of Canada;

That the Committee be composed of eight Senators;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.—(Honourable Senator Roblin P.C.)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is now some time since my good friend Senator Watt introduced this motion in the chamber on April 5 last. After its introduction it stood on the Order Paper—I was almost tempted to use the word “languished” on the Order Paper—until such time as Senator Frith was able to resolve the position of the government in respect to this matter. On May 30, some seven weeks after it was introduced, he gave us to understand that the government would support the resolution of the Honourable Senator Watt.

Then I have to confess to being responsible for a further two-week delay, because I adjourned the debate and, unfortunately, was not able to be here last week, being engaged in senatorial business in other parts of the country. Therefore, on the first occasion after that adjournment that I possibly could,

I rise to make my small contribution to the consideration of this important topic.

The terms of the resolution are clear. The operative part of that resolution is that a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing aboriginal peoples of Canada. I want to leave no doubt in the mind of anyone that, as far as I am concerned, this is a very important issue. I think it is so regarded. It is regarded as an important issue, for example, by the Government of Canada. In considering this matter, I had occasion to review the policy statements of the Government of Canada on this question of aboriginal peoples and there has been a surprising number of them. I will only deal with a couple that I think are germane to our consideration here.

In 1975 an agreement was reached between the National Indian Brotherhood and the committee of the federal Cabinet to establish a mechanism for on-going consultation on all issues affecting Indian peoples, which certainly was considered to be a monumental step at the time. Then, later on, in the fall of 1977, I think, the Cabinet Native Council of Canada Committee was established and continues to meet, I am told, on a regular basis. Of course, we have had very detailed and definitive discussions with respect to the position that aboriginal peoples ought to be accorded under the Constitution Act in Canada. So perhaps you could say that this is not a topic that the government of the day has regarded lightly. I would say that they have been very active indeed in dealing with the issues involved.

In fact, since 1980, I think it can be said that in the person of the Honourable John Munro, who is the minister in charge of this department, we have had what could honestly be described as an activist minister. Anyone who has been watching Mr. Munro's work in the past few years must give him credit for being a very activist minister in this whole field of aboriginal problems and policies, and he has been working hard, with some success, in trying to resolve and clarify some of the major issues that are involved in this topic.

Also, in the person of the Honourable Senator Willie Adams, whom I salute in his absence, we have an active senator because I know that, certainly within the councils of the government, he has not let the question of aboriginal rights go without a spokesman.

Today we had Bill C-46, in which not only the Cree and Naskapi bands but also the Inuit band of Fort George are included in what must be regarded as a milestone in the developing relationship between the aboriginal peoples and the rest of the country, and a milestone in defining a role, which I hope and believe will be a constructive and progressive role, for aboriginal peoples to run their own affairs in a way that we have not yet seen in the rest of the country. Also, there is the fact that we are considering a split of the Northwest Territories in two, one half of which would be roughly regarded as a place where the Inuit people will have an interest in things. That is something that should not be overlooked.

Not only has the government been very active, but so has Parliament. Parliament has been seized of this matter in no inconsiderable way. Parliamentary initiative, so far, I think, has been quite important. A special committee of the House of Commons, under the chairmanship of Mr. Keith Penner, a member of that chamber, has studied the question of Indian self-government and much else, although I am conscious that the problems of the Inuit people were not addressed nearly as directly as were the problems of Indians. Basically that committee was oriented toward the aboriginal people that come under the description of Indians.

That committee has certainly not been without its results. I heard 588 witnesses; there were 217 groups represented and there were 60 meetings, 39 of which were outside of the city of Ottawa. I know that the terms of reference were widely phrased and I would like to read some of them: The financial transfer, control and accounting mechanism in place between the bands and the Government of Canada; legislative powers of bands and their relationship to the powers of other jurisdictions; the recognition and the affirmation of existing aboriginal and treaty rights of aboriginal people, and so forth. There are perhaps a dozen clauses in the terms of reference, but the ones I have mentioned give some reflection of the widespread nature of that inquiry.

I know that in my own province of Manitoba nine meetings were held. I could read the names of the organizations whose representatives attended those meetings, if it would serve any real purpose, but I think I will content myself by saying that nine groups were involved in the meetings. At every meeting an aboriginal group that wished to be heard was heard, and 34 people gave testimony either by their presence or direct participation. That gives honourable senators some idea of what happened in one part of the country, and I can say that that is an accurate indication of what went on all over the country.

If one looks at the research programs commissioned by this study on aboriginal peoples initiated by the committee of the other place, one will see that they are, indeed, impressive. The study related to questions pertaining to economic foundations for Indian self-government. Could anything be more important than that if one is considering a change in the system of administration in this respect?

Another subject addressed related to various models for relations between indigenous peoples and governments. Again, that is on the theme of self-government for aboriginal people. Another subject was the federal expenditure and mechanisms for their transfers to Indians, and much more.

What I am really trying to say is that the investigation conducted by the committee of the other place into the problems facing the aboriginal people of Canada, we must, in all fairness, describe as having been an extremely detailed, exhaustive and, in my opinion, sincere effort to come to grips with that problem, a problem which has been vexing the governments of the country for some period of time.

On October 20, 1983, the report of the committee, consisting of 54 pages, was published. By my count there are at least 67 recommendations. So, insofar as the Indian section of the aboriginal society of this country is concerned, we have had a parliamentary committee publish a report which has, I think, made a profound impact. I do not think there is any doubt about that. I think we see that reflected in what the government is doing these days; I think we see that in the changing opinions within Parliament itself; and we see that reflected in the response the aboriginal peoples are making to this whole problem. It, I think, can be described as leading to a climax of activity in this whole question of our aboriginal peoples and their relationship to the rest of the Canadian state.

Honourable senators, that indicates to me that this is a problem which Parliament has not ignored; that indicates to me that this is a problem which has received considerable attention from one house of Parliament and has some bearing on what should be done next. I refer, then, to the special Senate committee recommended to us to deal with problems and issues facing aboriginal people.

Are all of the problems solved by the studies and legislation that are in the course of consideration now? By no means. I suspect that the Inuit people might say that they have not received the same sort of attention that the Indian people have, so perhaps it would be reasonable to expect them to ask for more attention.

So the problems are not all solved. Should the Senate take an interest in the matter? By all means. I say that because, even though the other house of Parliament has made an exhaustive study, it by no means rules us out of concern in this matter. So it comes down to a question of how this house should show its concern and conduct any investigations that might be initiated into the general question of the problems facing aboriginal peoples.

I am going to persist in my previous recommendation and say that, in my opinion, the Senate would be well advised to stick with the well-established committee system it has in place. In view of the way in which the matter has been developing in the other house of Parliament, and in the country generally, it seems to me that there is good reason for us to adhere to our current committee system.

I point out to honourable senators that with the number of committees we now have, we have to supply well over 200 places. There are well over 200 places that must be supplied by the members of the Senate in order to operate and man the committees we currently have. I am in receipt daily, in my job as deputy leader on this side, of telephone calls from committee chairmen asking for help to staff the committees because they are having difficulty obtaining quorums. We had a problem this morning in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which is one that usually attracts good attendance. We cannot today, with any ease of mind, declare that we can man the committees we now have. I am not saying this solely on behalf of the opposition, because we are fielding our share, but I say that the Senate is overloaded in respect of demands being made on its numbers to man its committees.

We have had two new Senate committees appointed during the past while, and we are now being asked to appoint a third. It seems to me that we should consider carefully whether that is really the right way to go.

Senator Watt, when speaking to Bill C-46 a few minutes ago, and in talking about the general situation, and referring, indeed, to his resolution regarding this committee, said that there are areas from time to time which require review and study. I agree with that statement, but the question is whether we need a special committee in order to do that. I do not think so.

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has as the second item on its remit the authority to deal with Indian and Inuit affairs. That committee, although I do not have the honour of being a member of it, has a splendid reputation for dealing with problems that are referred to it. That committee gave us the report on the elderly citizens of this country, and some time ago on science, and much more. It is a good working committee and can be trusted to carry out any assignment given to it. I think we should allow the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, under its second remit for Indian and Inuit affairs, to monitor the progress, as my honourable friend, Senator Watt, suggests, and to initiate its own investigations from time to time as it sees fit.

Incidentally, honourable senators, I have just received the budget for that committee, and although all of it may not have been approved, the request is for $250,000. Among other things it intends to do, in dealing with another question before it, is visit all capital cities of the country, including Yellowknife and Whitehorse, as well as other northern communities to be selected.

I do not know, but I guess it is my economical Scots forebears on my mother's side, let me say, that makes me think that that committee has enough money and a program in place under which it could deal with Indian and Inuit affairs, if that subject should be added to its mandate.

I think that this is a good cause; I think it could be well served with the mechanism we now have; I think that that is desirable because of pressure on honourable senators at the present time to fill all posts now allocated to them on committees so that they can do their work effectively. I would be happy if the member who has suggested this motion, and perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, were to reconsider the whole matter. Nothing would be lost, and I think much would be gained if we made the best use of the machinery at our disposal rather than trying to move forward to go into something which we will find some difficulty in handling and promoting.

My conclusion, honourable senators, is that this subject matter is well worthy of our attention and I recommend to the Senate that we should sustain the remit of this topic to the committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology and refrain from asking that a special committee be appointed.

On motion of Senator Cottreau, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 13, 1984

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

CREE-NASKAPI (OF QUEBEC) BILL

SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 2:

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Leblanc, for the second reading of the Bill C-46, intituled: "An Act respecting certain provisions of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement and the Northeastern Quebec Agreement relating principally to Cree and Naskapi local government and to the land regime governing Category IA and Category IA-N land".—(Honourable Senator Asselin P.C.).

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate yesterday after Senator Watt introduced this bill for second reading. I have had an opportunity to glance at the clauses of this piece of legislation and to speak with Cree and Naskapi representatives as well as with the people who drafted the bill.

It is a technical and rather structural measure. It is a substantial bill and I think that the questions I have in mind would be better answered if we could hear witnesses in committee.

For that reason, I will not intervene before third reading, so as to enable the sponsor of the bill to proceed with his statement on second reading.

[English]

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Watt speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, Bill C-46 was debated yesterday, when I outlined the importance of the bill and recommended that it be passed as quickly as possible. I ask for your support of this motion for second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will notice on their desks a notice from the Committees and Private Legislation Branch of today's meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, giving details of the witnesses who will be appearing before that committee. The meeting will commence at 2.30 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

STADACONA MINES (1944) LIMITED—FIRST READING

Hon. Martial Asselin presented Bill S-16, to revive Stadacona Mines (1944) Limited, and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Bill read first time.

Senator Asselin, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

TWENTY-SECOND AND TWENTY-THIRD REPORTS OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's twenty-second and twenty-third reports approving budgets of the following committees:

Social Affairs, Science and Technology; and

Banking, Trade and Commerce.

(For text of reports see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

RIGHTS OF FRANCO-ONTARIANS—REPRESENTATIONS BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question concerns the request made by Prime Minister Trudeau of the Ontario Premier, Mr. Davis, to have the linguistic rights of Franco-Ontarians recognized in the Constitution.

The Prime Minister says in his letter that as long as there is no parity between the constitutional rights of linguistic minorities in Ontario and Quebec, people will still be able to fan the flames of the political debate on the future of Quebec.

More important than this lack of parity, unilateral patriation of the Constitution without providing a veto right for Quebec, or alternatively, without granting full financial compensation to a province which refuses to transfer its legislative jurisdiction to Parliament, creates a situation which favours centralization.

Does the Prime Minister plan on writing all premiers and inviting to make the required amendments to the Constitution so that Quebecers will be more easily convinced that they can expect a greater respect for their own aspirations within the federation?

• (1410)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can appreciate the comments of the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: It was a question.

Senator Olson: I understand that it is a question. I will have to take the question as notice. The views of the Prime Minister are well known with respect to this matter. He has, on a number of occasions—

Senator Flynn: Tell us what they are, if you know them.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Let him reply.

Senator Olson: The views of the Prime Minister and the action he would prefer to take are well known. Perhaps I shall get them directly from his office and present them here for the record and in response to the question put today by the Leader of the Opposition.

As far as I am concerned, I do not need any further illumination on the views of the Prime Minister because I know what they are. I shall take the question as notice so that we may get the precision from his office which the question deserves.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Leader of the Government says that he knows the views of the Prime Minister on the question that I put. However, I am not sure that the leader understood my question, but he can read it in Hansard. The position of the Prime Minister on the question of the rights of Franco-Ontarians has changed since the patriation of the Constitution because at that time he was not asking Mr. Davis to do it—

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Yes, he was.

Senator Flynn: No, sir, he was not! He was satisfied, and you for one voted against the amendment moved in the Senate to achieve that goal. You should hide your head under your desk, rather than say stupid things like that.

Senator Thériault: It is the truth.

Senator Flynn: We know that the position of the Prime Minister has shifted on this question of the recognition in the Constitution of the rights of the Franco-Ontarians. My question is not related to that point but to the insertion in the Constitution of either the right of veto or full compensation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I understood that part of the question very clearly but I have to say, contrary to what the Leader of the Opposition is attempting now to put forward as the view of the Prime Minister, that the fact is that the Prime Minister has not—

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator Olson: —changed his view as to the rights of Franco-Canadians living in Ontario. He has made the request on a number of occasions that the Government of Ontario—

Senator Flynn: Not at the time.

Senator Olson: —give the same kind of recognition that is requested in his present letter to the Premier of Ontario.

Senator Flynn: I challenge that assertion by the Leader of the Government. At the time of the discussion the government was satisfied with the arrangement arrived at during the night of the fourth and the fifth, if my memory serves me correctly, excluding Quebec from the agreement. At that time, Senator Thériault, there was no question of inserting the rights of Franco-Ontarians in the Constitution. The Prime Minister was happy with that move. He said that he was not asking for inclusion at that time. However, he is asking for it at this time. It is a shifting of the Prime Minister's position—we know that very well.

Be that as it may, my question is not on that point. I wish to know if the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows what the Prime Minister's position was at that time with regard to the right of veto. We know well that he was satisfied not to give any right of veto to Quebec, to Ontario, or to any group or province. We know that compensation was only to be allowed in matters relating to culture and education.

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Opposition has that all wrong.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: It is not only part of what he is saying that is wrong; he has it all wrong. On those dates, the Prime Minister said that he was not completely satisfied with the arrangement which had been worked out. I wish to make that clear.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: However, he clearly understood that it was probably the best arrangement he could come up with.

Senator Thériault: At that time.

Senator Olson: That is right, at that time; and that there would be further work done with respect to it. He said that. Let us get that straight.

With respect to Quebec being a participant in the agreement and, therefore, having that set down, the Prime Minister did not exclude Quebec. The senior officials, including the Premier of Quebec, excluded themselves from the agreement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: I would like to differentiate between the position of the government and the position of the majority here in the Senate. We know very well that when the question was put to the majority here with respect to inserting this right of Franco-Ontarians in the Constitution the majority voted against it—you, Senator Olson, and Senator Thériault included.

Senator Thériault: We voted against your amendment because we knew your only purpose in proposing it was to prevent the patriation of the Constitution.

Senator Flynn: That is all well and good.

Senator Olson: That is exactly right. The Leader of the Opposition is not famous for his capacity to take in the results of certain actions. If any senators, or the majority, had voted for his amendment he knows very well that the effect would have been to impede the great progress made in bringing into being the Constitution which was agreed to by most of the people whose agreement was necessary. It is funny that the Leader of the Opposition now tries to argue against that point since it was specifically explained to him at the time.

Senator Flynn: One of the results of the position taken by the government and the majority was the re-election of a separatist government in Quebec.

Senator Olson: I do not agree with that either.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: That is just wishful thinking!

NEWFOUNDLAND

ST. JOHN'S-PORT AUX BASQUES RAILWAY FREIGHT LINE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has to do with something which neither he nor the minister can contradict.

Five years ago the federal government commenced what has proven to be a successful revitalization of the St. John's-Port Aux Basques railway freight line in Newfoundland, after taking away our rail passenger service. In view of the fact that this five-year period is coming to its conclusion shortly, is the government prepared to commit itself to the continued existence of this railway line which is so important to transportation in Newfoundland?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot give an answer to that question off the top of my head. I will ask for a reply from the Department of Transport. I do not think there has ever been any doubt that the services which are required in that area will be maintained.

Senator Marshall: The leader of the Liberal party in Newfoundland, Mr. Stephen Neary, has said:

—I think it's absolutely essential that, before the next federal election, we get a firm commitment from the federal Government that the railway is here to stay in Newfoundland.

Here, he is referring to the railway line. The passenger service is gone; it was taken away under a deal made by a former premier. I wonder if confirmation could be obtained from the Minister of Transport, from the cabinet or from the Prime Minister that they will live up to their commitment?

• (1420)

Senator Olson: I shall take the question as notice. I think I understand what Senator Marshall is searching for but I do not have that data with me today.

CANADIAN SPORTS POOL CORPORATION

SALE OF TICKETS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask the Leader of the Government if he has any report on the result of the sale of sports pool tickets for the first drawing. I have seen some figures somewhere, but I will try not to say where because the Leader of the Government will object; he will not want to reply. In any event, I have seen some figures somewhere that do not seem to indicate any great success in this venture.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I am really impressed with the Leader of the Opposition's attitude with respect to the rules of this house. I think if he reads carefully the replies that I gave to questions on this matter on both Monday and Thursday of last week, he will note that I gave an undertaking to bring those results as soon as they are available. So far as I know, they are not yet available and, indeed, they are not being compiled on a weekly basis. That was clear in the reply I gave him last week. Therefore, if he has seen some speculation somewhere that someone is making those figures available before the minister responsible does so, he should treat it as such—speculation.

Senator Flynn: I was wondering if you would inquire from Senator Perrault whether he knows anything about the situation. Senator Perrault was interested in that venture at its origin.

Senator Olson: I know that Senator Perrault knows a great deal about a number of things but, at the moment, he is not responsible for this particular government activity. Under the rules—and perhaps Senator Flynn would like to take note of this—under the rules—

Senator Flynn: I do not have to take note; I know the rules as well as you do.

Senator Olson: Under the rules, you are confined to asking questions of the minister with respect to those things for which he is responsible to Parliament and, in fact, it is limited to that.

Senator Flynn: I was asking questions of you. You are here to reply for all of the ministers. That is probably why your answers are so diluted.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Diluted answers to deluded questions.

Senator Olson: My colleagues on this side are attempting to have me say that these are diluted answers to deluded questions. However, the answers are not diluted. They are clear and precise.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE VISIT OF MR. CHEDLI KLIBI, SECRETARY-GENERAL OF THE ARAB LEAGUE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a specific and illuminating reply by way of a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on June 12 concerning a possible visit to Canada by Mr. Chedli Klibi, the Secretary-General of the Arab League.

As honourable senators may be aware, the invitation to Mr. Klibi to visit Canada was made some time ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. MacEachen. Since that time, several efforts to arrange a visit to Canada by Mr. Klibi have not been successful because of the difficulties both parties have encountered in finding mutually convenient dates. However, the invitation stands and efforts to find a suitable date for a visit will continue after the summer recess.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesday, June 20th, 1984, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE OFFSHORE APPLICATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the third reading of Bill C-16, to apply the customs and excise jurisdiction of Canada to the continental shelf of Canada and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I had thought that the sponsor of the bill might have a statement to make, but, if he does not, I do.

There are some facts that I should like to place on the record regarding this bill before it passes, and some conclusions I draw from those facts and the debate which took place in this house and from the two days' discussion of the bill during the meetings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on June 7 and June 12.

First of all, let me reiterate our position that the achievement of the main purpose of this bill—that is, the extension of Canada's Customs and Excise jurisdiction beyond the 12-mile limit out to the 200-mile limit, to the continental shelf—is logical, appropriate and necessary. The bill also brings with it a 20 per cent rate of duty on vessels and floating structures used for petroleum drilling beyond the 12-mile limit. The alleged purpose of the tariff is to stimulate activity in Canada's shipbuilding industry.

We thought it was proper that the Senate should pause for a little while to examine more closely this tariff and the assumptions behind it, the objective it is intended to achieve, and its likely effect. We thought it was especially proper for us to pause for a couple of days on this matter in view of the fact that the House of Commons gave the bill second reading, study by committee of the whole and third reading in the space of two hours a couple of weeks ago.

Honourable senators, the testimony before the committee confirmed what the minister, Mr. MacLaren, said in introducing the bill in the other place, as well as what the sponsor of the bill in the Senate, Senator Hastings, said to the effect that the revenue gain to the treasury from the tariff is not very significant. Officials who attended the committee meetings said that there would be a gain of $75 million annually from the tariff to which they add a $55 million saving from the phasing out of the shipbuilding subsidy, a measure which they associate with this bill. That comes to $130 million annually, but against that must be placed the costs that are incurred by the treasury, which come to something in the order of $123 million. The principal items of that cost are the $83 million in increased PIP grants to pay for the government's share of the increased cost to the companies occasioned by the tariff, and $38 million in corporate tax write-offs.

So the bottom line, the officials told us, is that there is projected a net gain to the treasury of some $7 million annually.

I may say in passing that in explaining how some of these figures were arrived at there had been some number crunching that was so sophisticated as to be suspect. I will not dwell on that point for the moment except to say that we shall see how it works out in the end.

● (1430)

One of the intriguing things about the numbers presented by the officials is that the increase in PIP grants to pay for the government's share of the increased exploration and development costs occasioned by the tariff is higher than the gross revenue that they expect to receive from the tariff. The PIP grants will increase by $83 million, but the gross revenue from the tariff is only $75 million. How can this be so?

I tried without success in committee to obtain some explanation of this. Since that time I have had inquiries made in the Department of Finance and the explanation is that the officials in that department assume that Canadian firms will increase their prices almost to the level of the import price including the tariff. This seems to confirm what some anti-tariff people have contended for a long time, namely, that tariffs not only increase the price of imports but they also increase the price of everything else. With the government paying in PIP grants anywhere from 20 per cent to 80 per cent of the increased cost of the tariff to the companies, it would appear that the tariff does not impose a great hardship in the sense of being an effective barrier to the import of foreign vessels and installations. Yet, we have on the record the statements of the minister who introduced the bill, Mr. MacLaren, and of the senator who sponsored it, Senator Hastings, that this tariff is going to produce $3 billion in new business for Canada over the next 10 years. That is $3 billion in new business that they, Mr. MacLaren and Senator Hastings, relate directly to this tariff. How is this $3 billion figure arrived at? That was one of the questions to which we tried to get answers in committee. The officials told us that it is expected that approximately $6 billion worth of vessels and similar equipment will be needed over the next 10 years. I quote one of the officials: "And we would hope to be able to supply half of that as a result of the tariff regime being extended to the offshore."

We had officials from the Department of Finance, from the Department of National Revenue and from the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion before us and they had considerable difficulty documenting those forecasts and, in particular, the $3 billion in new business that is alleged to be waiting for us if we just slap on this tariff. To put it charitably, there is not much evidence to support that figure.

Under questioning they fell back on such statements as: It would help to encourage Canadian sourcing, but the extent of the tariff's effectiveness would be difficult to predict. At one point yesterday an official said this: "It is not clear to me whether all of that $3 billion would result from a change in the tariff alone; in other words, that we would not receive any of that business without the tariff." A little later he said:

"...yes, without the tariff we would receive something less than $3 billion; however, we would still receive some of it." That type of rather ambivalent statement of the effect of the tariff should be placed alongside the rather categorical assertion made by spokesmen for the government in the other place and here in introducing this bill and claiming $3 billion in benefits from this tariff over the next 10 years.

Finally, under examination, the officials invoked rather longer-term considerations by which to defend the tariff. The tariff would help create what they called a climate in which domestic industry can develop. They made a rather plausible and reasonable argument to the effect that experience in the North Sea and elsewhere has shown that there is a 20 per cent price disadvantage occasioned by what they call the learning curve when companies begin to work on new projects related to the offshore. One assumes, therefore, that one of the purposes of the tariff would be to offset this 20 per cent price disadvantage that local firms are subjected to by reason of the learning curve. However, there is no word in this bill, or from the government, to the effect that there is going to be any phasing-out of this tariff as the learning curve of a firm, or Canadian firms in general, disappears. In summary, the inescapable conclusion is that the effect of this tariff is not very significant as a barrier to imports.

In terms of what the companies have to pay, one of the officials stated that the incremental cost to the sponsors of these huge offshore projects would be, in his words, peanuts. Honourable senators, as I pointed out the other day, there already exists an effective regime for achieving what is called full and fair access for Canadian suppliers. This exists in the Canada Benefit Agreements that are negotiated by COGLA—the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration—with the exploration and development companies.

In committee we had an opportunity to hear a full explanation of how this works from a man from the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, Mr. Reynolds. He explained, with one eye on the possibility that someone from GATT might be listening, how COGLA works on the exploration companies, how it reviews the bid lists with the companies, how it discusses the capabilities of Canadian suppliers, and all that sort of thing. He made an interesting exposition, from which I will not quote except to relate to honourable senators that, according to the spokesman, this COGLA administration has produced what they call "a quite significant shift in attitude and in the procedures that the oil and gas companies use internally to seek out and develop new Canadian sources of supply." I simply recommend that honourable senators who may be interested in this would do well to read the evidence of Mr. Teschke, the Deputy Minister of DRIE, and of Mr. Reynolds, one of his officials, given before the committee yesterday.

The point of this is that COGLA seems to be working—and working quite effectively—by means of moral suasion and the carrot and the stick, to the extent that the carrot and the stick are appropriate weapons under the GATT. They have not run afoul of our GATT obligations in administering these Canada Benefit Agreements.

If that exists, honourable senators, we come back to the question: Why this tariff? The answer finally given by the spokesman for the government was that this tariff is being imposed because the shipbuilding industry wants it. I suggest to honourable senators that the shipbuilding industry wants it, not because it believes that the 20 per cent tariff is going to be particularly effective but because it is a step in the right direction for the industry and will enable it to come back later and ask that the tariff be increased and set at some higher level, or that other more protectionist measures that have been advocated by that industry be implemented. Indeed, I should take the time of the Senate for just a moment to quote from the testimony of Mr. N. G. Darroch of the Tariff Division of the Department of Finance, given before the committee on June 7. I quote from the unedited transcript:

The shipbuilding industry have not commented directly on the level of the tariff. In essence, they would like to see prohibition of imports into the offshore area or anywhere else. They feel their competitive position is so poor vis-à-vis foreign competition that they are very pessimistic about even this legislation which was designed to help them. They feel it does not go far enough. They have continued to make representations for additional protective measures.

Mr. Walsh, who is the President of the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association, was at the committee meeting yesterday. The chairman of the committee, our colleague Senator Barrow, told us that he had invited Mr. Walsh to comment on the bill, but Mr. Walsh declined except to say that he urged that the bill be passed, and as soon as possible. I had the opportunity to have a brief conversation with Mr. Walsh. I do not think he would mind my referring to it here. Mr. Walsh said that if they had had the tariff a few years ago, it would have meant considerable new business for them. As it is, he does not deny the contention that the tariff is not going to be very effective in that regard. However, he says it is a step in the right direction—it is a first step. His main reference in conversation was to the wide range of protective measures and government subsidies that are available in other countries. Whether it be the United States, the United Kingdom, Japan, Norway, South Korea or whatever, the shipbuilding industry around the world seems to enjoy very heavy protection, subsidy and government support. The question is whether Canada can ever try successfully to match this panoply of protectionist measures.

Mr. Walsh and his association have made a submission to the Royal Commission on the Economic Union, commonly known as the Donald Macdonald Commission. They have made eight recommendations, many of them, frankly, quite protectionist in nature or potentially very costly to the treasury. Obviously, the government does not think that Canada can possibly try to compete with that array of protectionist measures which is available to the shipbuilding industry in other countries. Therefore, the government threw the shipbuilding industry a bone and that is what this bill is all about. The government has thrown the industry a bone in the form of one of the things the industry sought, namely, the tariff.

Honourable senators, this really brings me to my final point, and it is this: Canada does not have a shipbuilding policy. The industry has been helped along by some government procurement, orders for Coast Guard vessels, and so on. The industry has been assisted to build for export by EDC financing during the seventies. Of course, the industry has asked that EDC-type financing be available to it for domestic commercial orders as well. The shipbuilding industry, as we were reminded, is not alone in making that expensive request of the government. The main point, however, is that, in terms of domestic commercial orders, the shipbuilding industry is in pretty bad shape—pretty unpromising shape. Domestic commercial orders are fleeing the country at a great rate.

The policy announced by Mr. Lumley in January of 1983 had this tariff as its centrepiece, yet the shipbuilding association, in its submission to the Macdonald Commission, stated that the key to the future prosperity of Canada's shipbuilding industry lies in the new requirements of the Arctic and east coast offshore. It was said, and I quote:

Specially designed and constructed equipment will be needed to meet the unique Canadian environmental challenge. Rigs, supply vessels and tugs will have to be capable of withstanding the harsh Arctic cold and ice or east coast deep waters and strong ocean currents.

What we are talking about here is the opportunity that is presented to the Canadian shipbuilding industry to meet the highly specialized needs of Canadian resource development. When we asked what the government is doing to ensure that the Canadian shipbuilding industry is able to meet this challenge and opportunity, the answer we received, in the words of Mr. Teschke, the Deputy Minister of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion is as follows, and I am quoting from the unedited transcript of yesterday's meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce:

● (1440)

First and foremost, we look to the Canadian shipyards themselves to provide the kind of expertise that is needed in the design and engineering skills to take advantage of these opportunities.

I would revert again to the explanation you had under COGLA. That is a major way in which we are trying to ensure that capable Canadian firms are given a full opportunity to participate.

The tariff is but one aspect of this. As we said before, I would have to come to the same conclusion that the tariff will not be all that significant; much more significant will be the capability of the yards themselves and how reliable they are in order to meet those needs.

So there is at least an implied criticism of the industry—certainly it is an admonition—on the part of Mr. Teschke, the deputy minister. He is saying that there is some onus on the industry to equip itself to meet those challenges and opportunities, and I believe that is a proper position for the government to take.

Well, are there incentives, in terms of research and development, manpower training—or, for that matter, the organization of the industry—that can be brought to bear to ensure that the industry is able to meet the challenges which its representatives say are the key to its future prosperity? It is hard to see, frankly, how a bit of government procurement for the Coast Guard, and the imposition of a 20 per cent tariff, are related to this objective. It is hard to see how the tariff will encourage the development of a prosperous, modern, competitive industry that is world class, at least in the kind of specialties they are talking about. So I have come to the conclusion that we do not have a shipbuilding policy, that the government is throwing the industry a bone in the form of this tariff, that the bill, to the extent that it brings in this tariff, is just an elaborate deception, a public relations gesture, on the part of the government.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: I said in another connection a week or so ago that while debate on a particular bill was ending, debate on the subject matter was just beginning. I would say something similar with regard to this subject—that debate on this bill may be coming to an end, but debate on the future of shipbuilding in this country has to continue, that we shall have to get much more serious about the debate than the government has been in announcing its policy and implementing this tariff in the bill now before us.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I should like to respond by commenting on the speech given this afternoon by the Honourable Senator Murray. May I say at the outset that I assume we are in total and complete agreement with respect to the sovereignty aspect of the bill, but it appears that we part company on how much activity will be stimulated from the imposition of the tariff aspect of the bill.

Senator Murray had a few comments to make regarding the operation of COGLA. I do not believe that Bill C-16 in any way interferes with the work of the COGLA administration and the Canadian benefits section of COGLA. Canadian benefits are an important part of that administration. It is part of the total Canadianization aspect of the National Energy Program whereby the applicant must submit, with respect to any exploration permit, a Canadian benefits section in his application wherein he indicates that his exploration activities will benefit Canada; how, where and with what suppliers; and an undertaking that he will keep to that exploration agreement.

Honourable senators, as a result of the work of the Canadian benefits section with respect to exploration agreements, the Canadian content in the exploration agreements has significantly risen over the past three years and has made an important contribution to Canadianization.

While Senator Murray questioned the impact that this bill will have on putting Canadian suppliers on an equal basis with foreign suppliers, he referred only to the shipbuilding industry. Shipbuilding supplies represent only part of exploration on the east coast. Many other supplies are needed in connection with exploration, and many suppliers in the eastern provinces will be on a more equal basis in tendering and pricing with regard to exploration on the east coast.

Senator Murray's criticism concerning estimates is, I believe, quite valid. I notice that a figure of 72.5 per cent was used with respect to PIP grants. That is assuming that every company on the east coast is 100 per cent Canadian owned, when, in fact, that is not the case.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It is 80 per cent and 20 per cent. How do you figure that one out?

Senator Hastings: The average is 72 per cent, assuming that each one is a 100 per cent Canadian company. We are talking about exploration equipment, and it is based on the number of companies on the east coast being 100 per cent Canadian owned, which in fact is not the case. My point is that Senator Murray's criticism is quite valid with respect to estimates. I would say it would be better if they used the word "guesstimates" in developing the figures. However, the fact is that while the criticism may be valid, over and above everything else the tariff aspect of this bill will have a positive effect in placing Canadian suppliers and the shipbuilding industry on an equal footing with foreign vessels that may be operating in that area.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Neiman, for the second reading of the Bill C-39, intituled: "An Act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto".—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am pleased to respond to Senator Godfrey who, in explaining the provisions of Bill C-39, dealt with the main objectives of the bill, which we welcome. However, when one considers that it is now 50 years since the original act was introduced, it is strange that 50 years later one finds so many anomalies and inequities in the act which are only now being corrected. We are still amending an act which has been in existence for 50 years. The problem is that the intervals between the introduction of amendments are too long. As the background notes to the bill explain, in two years' time, most war veterans allowance recipients will be over 65.

● (1450)

The main objective of the bill is to expand the Aging Veterans Program, a program for which I must commend the government, with one criticism. They should recognize that there are too many bureaucratic delays in adjudicating applications. This bill was introduced two years ago. I understand that up until now there has been a 20 per cent refusal rate, which is too high. However, any provision that increases a program by $100 million has to be accepted with some gratitude. Even though the $100 million will be expended over a period of three or four years, I understand that in the fiscal year 1988-89, $57 million will be budgeted to allow for the care of 14,000 veterans in their own communities and homes. This is good. Veterans who need geriatric care will not have to go hundreds of miles to a hospital but will be cared for in their own homes. Senator Godfrey has given the details on this subject.

Another good thing included in this bill is the allocation of $600 per year per veteran for transportation costs, allowing the veteran to be transported to his destination with an attendant. Also included in the upgraded program is $60.24 per day for adult residential care and nursing home care service, $4,300 per year for home care services and $500 per year for ambulatory health care services. I can see no reason for objecting to this bill, other than the fact that it does not include services for all veterans. However, I recognize that we cannot include everybody. But I repeat that, after 50 years, Canada should be able to recognize, with all the expertise we have today, all veterans and give them the care to which Canada committed itself back in 1914.

Without being emotional, I would like to mention something about my trip to France for the 40th anniversary of D-Day. As a Canadian, one is struck by the fact that even after 40 years there is still a very emotional bond between the French people and those Canadians who landed at Normandy on D-Day. It was gratifying to be able to say that you were a Canadian and that you participated in the event. Canada is considered a great country, and it is unfortunate that this bond is the result of suffering and war, but I think all Canadians who attended the anniversary services must have wondered how after 40 years such a bond could exist between veterans who served and made sacrifices and the people of these far off lands. I think we should all feel very humble while at the same time being proud that Canada did such a good job in achieving that goal.

It is significant that we are considering a bill which will have a positive effect on the final years of veterans. One of the other objectives of the bill is to recognize veterans who are under age 65 and who are not receiving, even though they are pre-aged 10 years, the full amount which they should receive. This program was to be phased in, starting three years ago, over a period of six years. However, the government in its wisdom has decided that it will eliminate the remaining two years of the phasing in period and provide equality for these veterans immediately. Once again, Senator Godfrey explained this provision very carefully and there is no need for me to repeat what he said.

I would like to mention a few of the 17 inequities corrected by this bill. Some of the amendments are relatively inconsequential but they eliminate administrative difficulties and anomalies. One very important one deals with the possibility that a veteran and his wife may have to live apart. The bill recognizes the increased expense that this imposes on both of them by the single rate, which gives each of them another $130 to live on. Only 120 recipients will benefit by this provision, but it removes an inconsistency which should have been recognized some time ago. This bill also recognizes the dissolution of a second marriage and allows for the reinstatement of widowers' benefits based on an earlier marriage. That is to say, previously, in a case where the wife died and the veteran remarried, he had to wait five years. That five-year period is eliminated and the relationship is recognized immediately. Another inequity or oversight was the fact that civilians who served in the Merchant Navy in Korean waters—and there are only a few—are now eligible for the civilian war allowance.

Previously, veterans who were not recipients and who had been convicted of an offence and sentenced to a term of imprisonment were not eligible to apply for an allowance. That veteran will now be able to apply and receive the allowance if it is for the purpose of supporting dependants or to assist in rehabilitation of the veteran. Although some people might object to such a provision, the concept of rehabilitation of convicts is recognized across the nation. Of course, the most important fact is that it is for the purpose of supporting dependants.

A few years ago the government decided to recognize World War I veterans who had less than 365 days' service in the United Kingdom, but they forgot those who qualified under the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. They are correcting this inequity so that those who fall within this category, such as people who served in the Merchant Marine or off the coast of the United Kingdom, will qualify.

While these amendments are welcome, there are still some inequities in the act which should have been recognized long before now. I mentioned some of them the other day while introducing a motion. I have mentioned them in committee, which Senator Bonnell will remember. One inequity which I will never understand is the disparity in the allowance given to war veterans allowance recipients and the allowance given to disability pensioners. I have mentioned this inequity a number of times, but I think it should go on record as often as possible. The other day in committee, the minister said that he recognized that there were certain inequities and agreed that it is right that I should propose changes. But the answers I get are very hard to understand. Today a war veterans allowance recipient who is married receives a sum of $914.68 a month, which is reasonable and he deserves it. This allowance will increase by $50 per month when the GIS is applied. Strangely enough, a disability pensioner, the veteran who was wounded, receives the same amount as the war veterans allowance recipient. Actually it is $9 more. But the veteran who has 70 per cent disability was pretty seriously wounded.

● (1500)

Another anomaly which should be corrected is in the situation whereby when the recipient of the war veterans allowance dies his widow is protected for 12 months at the married rate. However, following upon the death of a war veteran who was receiving a 70 per cent disability allowance, which amounts to $950.44, his widow will receive $100 less. She does not have a chance to adjust to the new circumstances. There must be something wrong with the system when one recipient receives preference over another. The minister has said that we are creating a different class of widow—something I cannot understand.

A 100 per cent disability pensioner receives $1,377 a month. The first month following his death his widow will receive the reduced sum of $814. A veteran who suffers exceptional incapacity, which takes him beyond the 100 per cent, may also receive an attendant's allowance, bringing the sum he and his wife receive to around $1,500 a month. However, following the veteran's death the amount his widow receives is reduced at the first of the following month by $700 to approximately $800. This situation has to be corrected. I recognize that a great deal of money would have to be spent in correcting the situation. However, after 50 years we should have a perfect act, even though I admit, as everyone does in Canada, that our legislation is equal to, or better than, that of most of the other countries in the world. This, however, does not excuse us from recognizing the fact that everyone must be treated equally.

There are certain veterans who are still complaining. As a result, new organizations are coming to the forefront. The fact is that we have not been able to find a means of adjudicating an application from a veteran in a reasonable length of time. This has been going on for many years now. In fact, it has been going on since pension and war veteran allowance legislation was first enacted.

In Toronto, a new group of veterans has been formed. They call themselves the "Suffering Veterans". This group has received letters from people across the country who display a bitterness towards the government in that it did not fulfil its commitment to them. The bitterness arises because many of these people were refused benefits. Something is wrong with the system when someone cannot accept the fact that a veteran was injured and is worthy of receiving a pension.

Another anomaly which has been created has to do with the Dieppe veterans. Many years after World Wars I and II the government agreed to commission Dr. Hermann to conduct a study with respect to the suffering of veterans in prisoner-of-war camps. It seems strange now to consider the fact that a scale was created whereby a person who was imprisoned for three months would receive just 10 per cent less than a person who was imprisoned for three years. Dr. Hermann's report sets out the effect of this imprisonment and, in some cases, it is pitiful to behold.

I hate to say it, but it seems that only now, just before an election, measures we have been asking for month after month are coming to the forefront. In the not too distant future we hope to see these inequities and discrimination factors corrected. Certainly, the most impressive one upon us now is with respect to the adjudication of pensions and the granting of disability pensions to those who cannot provide evidence of the fact that they were injured. It is not in their pay records; however, they are certainly suffering and the medical facts should bear that out.

Honourable senators, I cannot see how it will benefit us to refer this legislation to committee for study. We are dealing with the same inequities which have existed over many years. I would like to remind honourable senators that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology produced a report some years ago entitled "They Served—We Care" which impressed upon the government the six or seven main anomalies in the act which still exist and can be corrected. The impression I have 40 years after World War II is that in 1914 no one would ever have accused Canada of not fulfilling its obligations to veterans. If ever there was a time to correct the act, then that time should coincide with the 40th anniversary of D-Day. I hope that we can continue to impress upon the minister and the government the need for further corrections to the act in order to recognize the service of our veterans.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words concerning this legislation. I notice that the bill is numbered Bill C-39 and that just last week we commemorated D-Day.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Senator Marshall on his appearance on the CTV's "Canada AM" program. He added dignity to the Senate of Canada and we were honoured by his partaking in the beaches of Normandy celebration which commemorated the great battle of D-Day.

Like Senator Marshall, I feel Bill C-39 is a motherhood issue. It is a good piece of legislation. It sets out what our committee has been asking for for some years. The department is now taking steps to put many of our recommendations into this legislation. The department has taken the first recommendation from our report, "They Served—We Care", making it possible for the widows of war veterans to receive their pensions immediately after the death of their husbands. This is in contrast to the pensions gradually taking effect over a period of five years, which was something proposed in the previous legislation.

We are now seeing the expansion of veterans' programs in order to assist war veterans allowance recipients who are receiving old age security or guaranteed income supplements. These people will now receive extra benefits under the Aging Veterans Program. This program will be brought into effect gradually over the next few years. By 1988 all veterans will be eligible for benefits under the Aging Veterans Program.

The Aging Veterans Program has been in effect for the past three years with respect to certain disability pensioners. It is now being promoted and expanded to include those receiving war veteran's allowances. If you receive a war veteran's allowance after October 1, 1984, and are 75 years of age or over you will be eligible for benefits under the program. If you are a war disability pensioner and receive the war veteran's allowance you will now be eligible for benefits at age 65. After January 1, 1986, the remaining war veterans' allowance recipients aged 65 to 74 will be covered. Following January 1, 1987, war veterans 65 years of age and older who are ineligible to receive benefits under the War Veterans' Allowance Program due to receipt of old age security benefits will become eligible for benefits under this program.

● (1510)

Basically, I want to say that I support this program. I think it is well worthwhile. There are still many things that need to be done. We who are members of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee are looking into veterans' programs and their budgets at the present time and will be making further recommendations to the Senate. However, I do want to say that I would like to congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs for accepting our recommendations in the past, especially those respecting the widows of pensioners.

In this new legislation, I also notice another anomaly that has been corrected. If a war veteran has a child who is disabled and is now over 21 years of age, that child will still be eligible for a disability allowance provided that the disability took place before the child became 21 years of age. Also, under this legislation, war veterans allowance recipients will now be able to use the services of the pension advocate. I would point out that previous to this legislation it was only the disability pensioners who were eligible for the free services of the pension advocate.

These amendments, then, make available many new services to veterans and to the widows and dependents of pensioners and will allocate a further $100 million towards the benefits for aging veterans. This new legislation will also benefit those civilian merchant navy personnel who took part in the Korean War, which is something that every senator in this chamber should support.

I would like to thank Senator Marshall for his strong work on our committee on behalf of veterans for the last three or four years. I hope that he will continue to work on their behalf. Even with these additional benefits, our work on behalf of veterans is not yet complete.

With those few remarks, honourable senators, I would like to say that I heartily support the bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will understand, if you listened to the debate on this bill, that Senator Godfrey will waive his right of reply under the rules. Therefore, honourable senators, on his behalf I am asking for second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

STADACONA MINES (1944) LIMITED—SECOND READING

Hon. Martial Asselin moved the second reading of Bill S-16, an Act to revive Stadacona Mines (1944) Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill S-16 is to revive Stadacona Mines (1944) Limited. In this sense, this private bill is similar to other private bills introduced in the Senate and enacted into law during the last session of Parliament. However, the particular facts relating to this bill set it apart, in some respects, from the other private acts to revive companies that were passed by Parliament.

Unlike the previous companies that were revived by Parliament, which were all privately owned, the company that is the subject of this bill was, at the time of its dissolution, publicly owned. On September 19, 1970, when it was dissolved, Stadacona had 6,900 shareholders.

Another fact to be noted in connection with this company is that ten years prior to its dissolution, the company had suffered heavy financial losses due to fraudulent acts on the part of certain persons who were directing the company.

Stadacona was incorporated in 1944. Its head office was in Montreal. Until 1958, it had been operating a gold mine in northwestern Quebec.

In 1960, the president and three other directors of Stadacona defrauded Stadacona of assets amounting to approximately $300,000. The Ontario Securities Commission, acting on a complaint of a shareholder about the fraud, seized certain shares owned by Stadacona. These shares are still held by the Ontario Securities Commission. The individuals involved were convicted of fraud and imprisoned.

After discovery of the fraudulent actions, the shareholders elected a new board of directors with a mandate to locate and recover the assets of Stadacona. Since most of the corporate records, except for the share register kept by the Canada Permanent Trust Company, were misplaced, the directors experienced difficulties in locating the assets. They, however, brought several law suits and recovered some assets.

One of the actions that was commenced was an action in the Quebec Superior Court in Montreal to recover certain loans made by Stadacona. That action is still pending.

Stadacona failed to file for two consecutive years the annual summaries that it was required to file under the Canada Corporations Act, due to an oversight on the part of its directors. As a result, Stadacona was dissolved on September 19, 1970. Stadacona did not carry on active business following its dissolution.

In 1981, the petitioner, Mr. I. Davis Fleming, a former director and solicitor for Stadacona, became aware that the defendant in the Quebec action had undergone a corporate reorganization and would have sufficient assets to satisfy a judgment against it. He, therefore, brought a petition in the Federal Court of Canada for the issuance of Articles of Revival under the Canada Business Corporations Act. The petition was dismissed on the grounds that the Canada Business Corporations Act does not contain a provision permitting the revival of Stadacona under that act. The Federal Court ruled that Stadacona can only be revived by a special act of Parliament.

The Petitioner has presented a petition to Parliament in order to revive Stadacona, thereby enabling it to resume the litigation it had commenced in 1960 and to obtain release of the shares seized by the Ontario Securities Commission.

Again, the facts surrounding this bill make it slightly different from those earlier bills that were approved by Parliament. The intent of the revival of the company is not to continue to carry on the business of the company, but simply to recover its assets and have them distributed proportionately among its shareholders of record.

The bill would revive Stadacona with retroactive effect to the date of its dissolution. The Bill would enable Stadacona to apply for continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act within three months of the special act coming into force and would oblige it to hold a meeting of its shareholders within six months. If the application for continuance is not made or if the shareholders' meeting is not held within these time limits, Stadacona would be automatically dissolved under the provisions of the bill.

Honourable senators, since this is a private bill, it will be necessary for a Senate committee to consider the facts relating to the petition as set out in the preamble of the bill. In addition, the committee will no doubt want to examine the text of the bill.

Honourable senators, I would propose, if second reading is granted, to ask that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): The government supports second reading of this bill and the reference of the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, as suggested by Senator Asselin for the reasons proposed by him.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

[Senator Asselin.]

Motion agreed to.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTIETH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, SEOUL, KOREA—DEBATE
CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bosa calling the attention of the Senate to the Seventieth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Seoul, Korea, 4th to 12th October, 1983, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada, and to the delegation's visit to China and their meetings with the officials of that country.—(Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure if Senator Rowe wishes to speak on this order today, but perhaps he can enlighten us.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I intended to make a few comments on this order but I see that many honourable senators have a great deal of activities and commitments for today—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You mean they are not here.

Senator Frith: We can stand it again in Senator Asselin's name—

Senator Rowe: My comments are very brief, and if there is no objection I should like to speak to this matter now.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I can safely speak for Senator Asselin on this matter and suggest that my honourable friend could make his contribution now with the consent of Senator Asselin and some of the rest of us.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, during the fall the Inter-Parliamentary Union met in Korea, and when the Government of China was apprised of that meeting, one of its agencies invited the Canadian delegation to visit China as a guest of that government.

Senator Bosa, who was the senior senator of the Canadian delegation, has already given a fairly exhaustive and comprehensive report, so I shall not be repetitious. Senator Bosa is not present in the chamber at the moment, but I should like to congratulate him because his contributions to the IPU meetings in Korea were first class and drew the admiration of all those present. I should also like to pay tribute to the other members of the Canadian delegation, Senator Asselin and the members of the House of Commons. The Canadian delegation was chaired by Marcel Prud'homme, a member of Parliament, whose dedication and organizing ability were manifested repeatedly during those important meetings.

I should like to say a few words about the Inter-Parliamentary Union itself. It occurred to me today when I was cogitating on these matters that we have been spectators in the past few years to what one could almost call the demise of the United Nations. A number of years ago when I was in Geneva I visited the building where the League of Nations had its headquarters and I had the same feeling as Senator Macquarrie had when he went there, that it was as if I were visiting a graveyard. Certainly that structure represents a graveyard of humanity's hopes and goodwill.

Following World War II, the United Nations came into being and with that came great hopes and expectations. There is no doubt that during the past 30 years it did achieve many things in the interests of world peace. Unfortunately, in my opinion, and I believe it is one that is shared by all who are familiar with United Nations work, the contribution of that body to world peace has been more and more ineffectual and ineffective in recent years. It seems to me that this enhances the necessity for us to give increasing support to other international bodies like the Inter-Parliamentary Union where you have a great majority of the parliamentary democracies—and some of them are not all that democratic—represented. There is no doubt, in my opinion, that the Canadian delegation in Korea was impressed by the fact that contrary to what many people think, and based possibly on the fact that the vast majority of our people do not know anything about these organizations like the IPU, that organization, as well as the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, is making great contributions, although some of those contributions are in modest ways. Nevertheless, they are making them. This becomes all the more necessary in view of what I have already alluded to, namely, the decline and near demise of the body that was set up with such high hopes in 1945.

I am not going to belabour this point because it is so obvious, but there is probably more strife throughout the world today than at any time in history. I think we have to face up to the fact that the danger of a universal conflagration is increasing every day. Perhaps some of you saw the program on the CBC last evening and the evening before about the effect of the nuclear threat on small children, which was appalling to parents and to other people who are concerned about the welfare of children. Sooner or later a mistake will be made. Sooner or later a madman or another Hitler will get control of the button. It may be two days or twenty-five years away, but the fact that we have survived with the nuclear bomb since 1945 does not in any way interfere with the law of probability which says that unless we do more than we are doing to control this monster, we are going to have a nuclear war. I do not want to sound emotional about this because we have to be objective about the effects of a nuclear war.

At this point I should like to take issue with the film "The Day After" which so many people praised and thought was so realistic. The film showed that the day following the nuclear war, people were walking around in the sunshine. What were they breathing? With a full-scale nuclear war, there will be nothing left to breathe. Certainly the sun will not be shining.

The reliance on deterrents is not enough. There is no guarantee that they are going to continue. The importance of international bodies like the IPU and others is increasing, and the fact that they do exist suggests that we ought to be taking more and more advantage of them.

● (1530)

During the sessions in Korea, I spoke on two major points. I have already referred to one, and the other concerned the fact that today our youth are confronted by a world which offers no opportunity for them. I believe that the figure of unemployed youth across Canada, given as 20 per cent, is far too low. In Newfoundland the unemployment figure for youth is probably 50 per cent; and for anyone to suggest that the situation exists because our youth are too lazy to work or are not interested in working is totally irresponsible and, I would suggest, totally stupid.

During the Second World War our young people were not too lazy to work, and they were not too lazy to work even 10 or 15 years ago. The truth is that there is no work for them. This situation, honourable senators, cannot continue, because if it does there will be an explosion. It will not be a nuclear explosion, but nevertheless an explosion, and we must face up to that fact.

Already we are on the receiving end of some undesirable consequences. In our own environment hardly a night goes by that there is not a robbery with violence or on assault of one kind or another. That was unknown a few years ago. We cannot have thousands of young people, aged from 16 to 24, with no money in their pockets, and with no earning power. That path spells disaster and suicide for a community. Yet that is the situation that now exists. Young people are reaching the point of desperation, and many of them are resorting to unsocial activities of one kind or another.

Before resuming my seat I shall point out that civilization as we know it is a very fragile thing. I am not sure that we have entirely learned the lessons of World War II. At that time we had one of the most "civilized" countries in the world, certainly one of the ablest countries in the world, and one of the most advanced in education and technology, in the space of a few years coming under the domination of a madman. German civilization was destroyed in the space of a few years, and had it not been for D-Day and associated actions civilization would have been destroyed worldwide.

Torture, tyranny and terrorism have now become almost worldwide—universal. Is there anything that Canada can do about it? I believe there is. She has an enviable history of spearheading social development, education, social welfare, et cetera, certainly over the past 100 years. Despite our problems, we are still one of the most advanced and prosperous nations in the world, and it is our duty to continue to spearhead social development at all levels and in all categories of our population. We have to assist other less well off countries in intelligent ways to overcome their problems; yet some of our assistance in the past has not been too intelligent. We should try to do something about poverty, disease, malnutrition and overpopulation, since such conditions are threatening us on a global scale. The fact of the matter is that the world today is facing more danger than at any time in its history, and we must do more to overcome those dangers than we have done over the past few years.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

CREE-NASKAPI (QUEBEC) BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Wednesday, June 13, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-46 intituled: "An Act respecting certain provisions of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement and the Northeastern Quebec Agreement relating principally to Cree and Naskapi local government and to the land regime governing Category IA and Category IA-N land", has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 13, 1984, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN NEIMAN
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Charlie Watt: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is worth mentioning for the record that the study of this particular bill has been rather unusual. The committee has heard the Indian Affairs Department and band officials directly concerned with this bill. It has received adequate answers to its questions. The House of Commons has gone through the three stages of this bill very quickly, following discussions which had been held between representatives of the concerned parties, namely, the Indian Affairs Department and the bands. Since yesterday, we have had here on this side very worthwhile discussions. Special circumstances have prevailed upon us to give this bill a privileged treatment. I simply want to put on the record that we are satisfied with the way this matter was dealt with, having received full information and co-operation from the interested parties.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government what is on the menu for tomorrow? I understand that the Senate is going to adjourn as usual until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. There is no bill for us to deal with since Bill C-46 has just been given third reading. I suppose that the bills which were given third reading today will be given the Royal Assent some time tomorrow. Is there anything else the Senate will have to deal with tomorrow?

Senator Frith: We shall only have to deal with the ordinary items on the order paper as well as the third reading of Bill C-16. Now, Senator Marshall seems to indicate that we shall proceed with third reading of Bill C-39 as well as two other bills. We shall also have Question Period and Royal Assent.

[English]

Senator Flynn: Bill C-16 was given third reading today.

Senator Frith: Yes, you are quite right. Tomorrow Bill C-39 will be given third reading. We hope to have Royal Assent at 4.30 instead of at 5.45 tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Great progress!

Senator Frith: It is progress; the question of how great it is is a matter of individual opinion.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 14, 1984

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, June 20, 1984, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

Senator Frith: Before the adjournment motion is agreed to, perhaps honourable senators would like to have an idea of our schedule for the next couple of weeks. The plan for next week is to sit on Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, rather than on Tuesday, and to be ready to deal with any legislation that may come to the Senate that week. I can tell honourable senators that, on the basis of information I have received, three or four bills have reached the report stage in the other place and could come to us by next Wednesday.

On June 12, Bill C-5, to amend the Radiation Emitting Devices Act, was reported from committee without amendment; Bill C-40, to amend the Old Age Security Act, was reported from committee with one amendment; and Bill C-33, to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act, was reported from committee without amendment. Yesterday the house reported, with two amendments, Bill C-37, to amend the National Housing Act, and continued debate on Bill C-9, to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

Honourable senators, the meeting of the house leaders scheduled for yesterday was cancelled, but I believe it took place today. I have no further information as to whether agreements were made respecting any of those bills, but all of them could possibly reach third reading. Should it turn out that the House of Commons has no legislation to send us and that we have no other reason to stay after next Wednesday, we will arrange our sittings accordingly.

For the final week until the summer adjournment on June 29, the proposal is to be ready to sit five days if necessary in order to clean up outstanding business. It would mean sitting on the Monday evening at 8 p.m. and the rest of the week at 2 p.m. each day.

There is one question mark about that. St. Jean Baptiste Day, which, as honourable senators know, is June 24, this year falls on a Sunday. I understand it is not provided in legislation or in the rules of the other place that when the holiday falls on a Sunday it shall automatically be celebrated on the Monday. The other house may very well be sitting that day, and that is why honourable senators would return that evening. If the other house sits, we may receive some of those bills, and that would give us something to do Monday evening. If I am incorrect about that, then we would possibly return on Tuesday of that week at 2 p.m., if it appeared that we might have some business to deal with. I repeat that there is a question mark concerning that week, but the plan at present is for the Senate to sit five days that week commencing on the Monday at 8 p.m.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we will be glad to co-operate in facilitating passage of legislation. However, I wonder if my honourable friend can be a little more definite as to what bills we might expect to receive next Wednesday. We need to know in order that we may be prepared to discharge our function. If we are to have a steady stream of legislation, as my honourable friend hopes, I would like to have more specific advice as to what we may expect to receive on Wednesday. Bills that are under amendment in the other place may take some time in Committee of the Whole. But what about the others? Can the Deputy Leader of the Government offer any assurance as to which bills we may receive on Wednesday?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wish I could be more definite. As honourable senators know, the normal practice in the other place is that the three house leaders meet after caucus and, if possible, agree on the bills that will receive priority and perhaps agree as to their passage. As I mentioned, that meeting did not take place this week. Before I entered the chamber this afternoon I sought information as to any such meeting today, but none was available. Should I receive information later today, I will place it on the record. If I am unable to do so, I will ensure that opposition officers and as many honourable senators as possible are notified of what legislation can be expected. In the absence of knowing what deliberations have taken place in the other place, I can only speculate. It is possible that one of the bills we are likely to receive will be Bill C-5, to amend the Radiation Emitting Devices Act. Another might be Bill C-37, to amend the National Housing Act. We might also receive the Western Grain Stabilization Bill. I have no information regarding C-40, to amend the Old Age Security Act. On the basis of how the other place has dealt with those bills, it is possible that Bill C-37 might come to us for consideration.

Senator Roblin: I am inclined to persist in this line of questioning because of the fact that the house leaders in the other place did not meet after caucus.

Senator Frith: It is possible that they did meet today. I was told that they were going to meet, but I have been unable to obtain more definite information.

Senator Roblin: If no legislation is forthcoming from the other place on Wednesday, what would be the intention of the Deputy Leader of the Government?

Senator Frith: If there is no legislation from the other place and no other reason for prolonging the sitting of the Senate, we would adjourn next Wednesday until the following week on the basis of any information I might have at that time. In other words, we want to be ready to sit and, as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has said, to co-operate in processing legislation; but we do not need to sit just for the sake of sitting.

Senator Roblin: I had it in mind to give the Deputy Leader of the Government more elbow room with respect to this matter. Instead of adjourning until a time certain on Wednesday, perhaps we could leave it open so that if nothing happens the Senate need not sit. If something does happen, then my honourable friend can use the regular procedure to summon the Senate, even though we had not adjourned to a time specific.

So, as I say, I would like to leave him a little elbow room and if he finds the bills are ready, then, of course, we will be here, but if they are not available it seems a bit questionable as to whether senators should come from all parts of the country to meet when there is no specific business. I would like to allow my honourable friend the discretion of calling the Senate if there is work. If there is no work to be done, then there is no need to call it.

• (1410)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps I did not make it clear that I feel we will get some legislation, but if as a result of the meeting it appears very unlikely we will get any legislation, I shall ask for leave both to revert to Motions and to make the appropriate motion.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. First, I have some bad news and some good news to convey. The bad news is that the bank rate has gone up again today to 11.84 per cent. The good news is that the people of

[Senator Frith.]

Canada will not have to endure for many more months the ruinous economic policies of the Liberal government—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): And proceeding in the same objective vein?

Senator Murray: —which have caused this rise in interest and inflation in this country.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): You have destroyed your question with an erroneous preamble.

Senator Murray: The trend of the bank rate has been almost relentlessly upward for many months. When the bank rate was at 10.56 per cent on March 20, the Deputy Leader of the Government described it as a “temporary mutation.” Indeed, it did turn out to be temporary—it went from 10.56 on March 20 to 11.84 per cent today. In putting a question to the Leader of the Government I want to draw to his attention a very important statement in Mr. Lalonde’s budget document entitled “The Canadian Economy in Recovery” which reads:

A crucial aspect of the medium-term projection is the underlying view of moderate sustained declines in interest rates—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Good luck!

Senator Olson: At the time it was true.

Senator Murray: Now that that assumption has blown up in the government’s face, will the minister indicate whether the government is re-examining the policies set out in Mr. Lalonde’s budget or whether we will soon have a supplementary document taking account of the fact that a central assumption in the Finance Minister’s budget has exploded in his face.

Senator Olson: I suppose it would be convenient for us to adopt the technology that is used in televising sporting events, the instant replay, because replays are appropriate for questions which, though they might have a different date and slightly different numbers, are exactly the same. The instant replay would also give the appropriate reply, which is exactly the same, too.

Senator Roblin: That is the problem.

Senator Olson: The Minister of Finance made an assumption, as any minister of finance has to do, on the basis of the circumstances that he and his advisers see around him at any given time. Even in retrospect they were appropriate at the time and, as a matter of fact, they may not be inappropriate even now so far as this matter is concerned. I do not think the Minister of Finance ever said that he was going to somehow take control of interest rates, because that is a major decision and a major departure from allowing the marketplace in various countries to set the rate, which depends on a number of other factors also controlled by actions in the marketplace. If the spokesman for the opposition believes that it is not an appropriate route for the government to follow, then he should state that that is what he is in favour of, instead of asking the question, “What are you going to do in these situations?”

Senator Murray: What are you going to do?

Senator Olson: The situation has an implication for which he should take responsibility, that is, the opposition believes there is something the government ought to do, for example, something along the lines of monetary or international exchange controls. That is to say, interfering with the free flow of capital and, indeed, the free functioning of the marketplace with respect to these factors. If that is what the honourable senator is in favour of, then there is a great deal of validity to his question; if that is not what he is in favour of, then it is just useless rhetoric.

Senator Murray: I say to the Leader of the Government that he has not denied—because there is no denying the obvious—the central point of my question that a fundamental assumption upon which Mr. Lalonde's policies and projections were based when he brought in his budget have now exploded in his face. With respect to the fundamental assumption, as the Minister of Finance said:

A crucial aspect of the medium-term projection is the underlying view of moderate sustained declines in interest rates—

That has not happened; in fact, the contrary has happened. The budget has blown up in his face. My question to the Leader of the Government—and I think it is a legitimate one—was with respect to what the government intends to do faced with this situation.

While I am on my feet, I will put a related question to the minister. It concerns comments made by his colleague, the Minister of Finance, just after the economic summit in London. Mr. Lalonde was quoted as having attacked the United States administration for its share of the responsibility for increasing interest rates; interest rates there being related, of course, to the United States deficit. My question to the Leader of the Government is: How can Mr. Lalonde credibly attack the size of the United States deficit when Canada's deficit, as a percentage of our gross national product and on a per capita basis, is higher than that of the United States?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, whether Senator Murray wishes to make his argument on a per capita basis or not is probably useful in terms of that argument.

Senator Murray: And as a percentage of GNP.

Senator Olson: Well, that may be—

Senator Murray: That is even more important.

Senator Olson: The fact of the matter is that lower interest rates are related to what happens in the United States because, of course, that country has by far the largest financial market and, indeed, the largest economy centralized in one unit in the world. There is no question about that. The influence of that market on interest rates is well known as being profound.

With respect to whether or not there is a per capita relationship in Canada, or in any other country, the fact is we do not have the same influence on the United States and, therefore, on international interest rates as does the marketplace in the United States.

Senator Murray: Surely the Leader of the Government is not arguing that the size of the Canadian deficit has no influence at all on interest rates in this country. Is that the minister's argument?

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Murray: I think the Leader of the Government knows that it is government demands on the money markets in this country which have been most significant in recent months and that but for those demands, arguably, the upward pressure on interest rates in this country would be less than it has been. This is the case because the demands from the private sector have not been that great. Does the minister disagree with that?

Senator Olson: You can argue all of those points around the periphery. However, the central factor determining interest rates in the international market—in the world—is the effect of what I described a few moments ago as the largest financial market in the world, that being the United States. However much you wish to argue around the periphery of that point, it does not change the fundamental truth of the matter.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE-CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to take this chamber into his confidence and tell us what the government has decided to do with respect to the claims of Canadians of Japanese origin who were mistreated in this country during World War II.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure whether the government has a new statement or an additional statement to what was said some time ago by the Prime Minister. However, I will make some inquiries with respect to that.

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister tell us whether the press report attributed to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism a couple of days ago is true or not? This report referred to compensation and spoke in terms of an apology and the setting aside of certain sums of money for an institute of racial relations.

Senator Olson: Everything that any minister in this government says is true, of course. I was aware that that statement had been made and I thought it was self-explanatory. That is why I am curious as to what further explanation the honourable senator is looking for.

Senator Haidasz: I would like to know whether or not Mr. Collenette's statement is a statement of government policy.

Senator Olson: Yes, in this case, Mr. Collenette, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, spoke for the government.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

LEADERSHIP CONVENTION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I understand from certain published words that the leader is not supporting someone by the name of John Turner in the leadership campaign of the Liberal Party and is supporting Mr. Chrétien, I believe. I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, if it should possibly happen that Mr. Turner becomes the new leader of the party—

Hon. D. G. Steuart: You may not even be here!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: It is back to the drawing board for you.

Senator Muir: Little Davie has a squawk, no matter whether it is on television or where it is. In any event, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, if events should develop as I have outlined, will he be one of the first to be dropped from the new cabinet?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Did you say “adopted” or “dropped?”

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: I did not hear that last by-play—

Senator Muir: That was because little Davie was squawking again.

Senator Olson: There is one thing that is very consistent about the opposition, and that is that the premise to the questions they ask is doubtful.

Senator Muir: I have a supplementary question. Perhaps the minister is aware that by being close to him—in fact only a few feet away—and listening to him, that attitude rubs off. It is like some sort of contagious disease.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-39, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, and certain other Acts in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES OF CANADA

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Aboriginal Peoples of Canada;

That the Committee be composed of eight Senators;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee have power to retain the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.—(Honourable Senator Cottreau).

Hon. Ernest G. Cottreau: I yield to Senator Steuart.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, today I will make a few points in support of my colleague, Senator Charlie Watt, concerning the motion for the appointment of a special committee on aboriginal issues.

The other day we listened with great interest to a speech given by the Honourable Senator Roblin on this matter, and we are happy to see the importance that he attaches to this question. He did a most eloquent job in listing some of the many issues confronting both the native people and the country as a whole.

However, I was somewhat confused by his final conclusion that the entire matter should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, as his recommendation does not appear to flow from the conclusions of his own argument. In fact, the very importance of this issue, as demonstrated by Senator Roblin, is, in my opinion, by itself the driving force behind the argument for the appointment of such a committee.

Senator Roblin states in his speech that the matter has already received exhaustive study and consideration at various forums and numerous levels. He cites that the recent report released by a House of Commons subcommittee chaired by the Honourable Keith Penner refers to the current constitutional reform process as it relates to the aboriginal peoples, and to the movement towards the creation of two new territories out of what is now the Northwest Territories. He also mentioned the vast amount of work which the government has proceeded with since 1975. All of that, in my opinion, simply goes to prove that an issue of such importance deserves greater attention by the Senate.

Senator Roblin suggests that the important issues facing the aboriginal peoples can be adequately handled by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, yet it is easy to see that that committee is already burdened with a great many issues ranging from veterans affairs to housing. In fact, that committee is responsible for such major and diverse issues as health and welfare, consumer affairs, cultural affairs and the arts, pensions, fitness and amateur sports, employment and immigration, social and labour matters, other general matters relating to science and technology and, of course, Indian and Inuit affairs.

It is indeed difficult to understand how a committee which is so obviously overburdened can give sufficient attention to an issue which occupies the attention of the first ministers on an annual basis, of a standing and subcommittee of the other house of Parliament, and of several line departments of the federal government. By referring this matter to the committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, I believe the Senate will in fact be saying that it does not accord to aboriginal issues the same importance that the rest of the country does at the present time.

● (1430)

Honourable senators, we must acknowledge that aboriginal issues merit their own committee if Senate efforts in this area are to have any credibility with the aboriginal peoples of Canada. In addition, if the Senate is to continue to prove its worth, we must be ready to respond to new developments in and new needs of this country. As was so amply illustrated by Senator Roblin's argument, aboriginal issues are surely one of these new concerns. That is not to say that the Senate should simply jump on the bandwagon of examining aboriginal issues. Instead, we should play a role for which we are uniquely qualified. By so doing we will be providing a forum for a long-term approach to aboriginal issues, as well as providing a mechanism for the development of innovative concepts.

While Senator Roblin rightly states that much work has already been carried out in this area, much work remains to be done because the necessary solutions have not yet been fully developed. The Penner report is a good example of this. While it will obviously have significant impact on the evolution of thought now taking place regarding the role and place of the aboriginal peoples in Canada, it can by no means be accepted as a final arrangement, even for those Indian nations which have supported this approach. Moreover, anyone following or listening to the proceedings of the last two first ministers' conferences on the Constitution will have heard time and time again arguments by provincial premiers that much work remains to be done on the concept of aboriginal self-government. Many such statements were made by premiers after the release of the Penner report and the government's reply. If you read, and I am sure most of you did, the Penner report and the government's reply, I think you would be as confused as I am as to what real conclusions they came to. Even among various aboriginal groups and nations there is a serious debate as to the direction in which they and their societies should be moving over the next few years. It is only too obvious that the Senate can, and should, make an important contribution in this area. However, it can only do so credibly by devoting sufficient time and attention to it, and that comes with a special committee dealing with aboriginal issues.

The Senate should move quickly on this matter in order to prove to the aboriginal peoples and the country as a whole that it is capable of responding to the changing times and needs. While other forums may be dealing with the specifics of the various issues facing the aboriginal peoples, it should be our responsibility to ensure that new ideas and innovative concepts are fully cultivated and explored in all their ramifications. Otherwise, the government, as well as the aboriginal peoples may, at this crucial time, grasp at concepts which have not yet been given the opportunity to mature fully. I am convinced that we in the Senate can, and should, play a major role in the serious debate concerning the future rights of aboriginal peoples and their specific problems. I ask for the unanimous support of the Senate in appointing this committee on aboriginal issues.

On motion of Senator Watt, debate adjourned.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT PROPOSALS

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Twelfth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which was presented on June 12, 1984.

Hon. Joan Neiman moved that the report be adopted.

She said: Honourable senators, as you know, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has submitted its report with respect to certain proposals tabled in the Senate on March 27, 1984. Those proposals are part of the Miscellaneous Statute Amendment Program of the Department of Justice, a program which was instituted some years ago to deal, in an expeditious way, with the correction of anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors that, inevitably, seem to occur in federal statutes. In addition, the proposals may include substantive amendments of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature provided that they do not create new offences or call for the expenditure of public money.

As was explained to the committee, the intention of this program is to have proposals, which presumably meet the foregoing criteria, submitted to parliamentary committees for pre-study. If, however, those committees object to any of the proposals, they may delete or amend them. Then, those which they approve are submitted in bill form to Parliament at a later date where, it is hoped, their pre-study will ensure quick passage into law.

After considerable study in committee, including two meetings with officials from the Department of Justice and from various other departments which would be affected by the proposals, your committee is satisfied that almost all of the proposals do, indeed, fall within the aforementioned criteria and has now reported to that effect.

While many of the 79 clauses in the document are substantive in nature, the explanations of the appropriate departmental officials have satisfied us with respect to their uncomplicated and uncontroversial nature, with two exceptions. The first has to do with a proposed amendment to the Citizenship Act, which would have expanded provincial regulatory power over the acquisition of real property by aliens. While your committee does not wish to express a final opinion as to the usefulness of such an amendment, we do believe that it merits detailed study beyond the bounds of this Miscellaneous Statute Amendment Program. Accordingly, your committee has recommended its deletion from the proposals.

The second exception has to do with proposed amendments to the Trademarks Act and to the Patent Act, which would have allowed delegation of powers, duties and functions by the Commissioner of Patents and the Registrar of Trademarks to "any person." Your committee was concerned with the apparent unlimited scope of these proposals and has accepted an undertaking from the Chief Legislative Counsel of the Department of Justice that that particular phraseology would be amended before the proposals are submitted to Parliament in draft bill form so as to define more precisely the kind or grade of officer to whom the powers set out in the amendments to the two acts could be delegated.

Your committee has also recommended two other amendments to the proposals, which deal with matters brought to your attention during the deliberations by the Department of Justice, one of which corrects certain inconsistencies in the Canada Evidence Act brought about by other recent statutory amendments and the other is simply a minor amendment to the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

[Senator Neiman.]

Beyond these changes outlined in our report, your committee has no objection to the other proposals.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving that we adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell, I have been informed that the meeting of the house leaders to which I referred earlier did not take place today. At this moment Senator Petten is trying to find out the likelihood of our receiving some legislation next week. I suggest that honourable senators check on this, because if it seems likely that we will not receive any legislation next week I will likely recommend that we accept Senator Roblin's suggestion and simply adjourn to the following Monday. We could come back at the call of the Chair, if necessary.

I repeat that it has been indicated to me that it is likely we will receive some legislation. If after Royal Assent and before the adjournment today the leadership in the house informs us that there is no chance of our receiving any bills in the meantime, I will ask for consent to withdraw the prior motion and move another in accordance with the suggestion made by Senator Roblin.

By way of notice, as things stand the Senate will be adjourned to Wednesday of next week at 2 o'clock, although there is still the possibility that we could follow Senator Roblin's suggestion.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

---

At 4.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Brian Dickson, Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to apply the customs and excise jurisdiction of Canada to the continental shelf of Canada and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof (Bill C-16, Chapter No. 17)

An Act respecting certain provisions of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement and the Northeastern Quebec Agreement relating principally to Cree and Naskapi local government and to the land regime governing

Category IA and Category IA-N land (Bill C-46 Chapter No. 18)

An Act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto (Bill C-39 Chapter No. 19)

An Act to provide for the creation by amalgamation of The Wesleyan Church of Canada (Bill S-15)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the Senate, I would like to inform you that I have received information from the other place to the effect that it is very likely we will be receiving legislation when we come back next week.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, June 20, 1984, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 20, 1984

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW BRUNSWICK

BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I take pride in bringing to your attention a matter of great importance to those Canadians living in New Brunswick. This year marks the bicentennial of the establishment of the province of New Brunswick. It was on June 18, 1784, 200 years ago last Monday, that by an order in council signed by His Majesty King George III the New Brunswick that we know today came into being. At that time the emerging population of Loyalists and Acadians was deemed sufficiently politically mature to be granted its own territory, its own province separate and distinct from Nova Scotia.

To commemorate this historic event, the people of my province have been celebrating in their various communities since January 1. The celebrations are in keeping with the customs and traditions of the particular region, and the culture and traditions that exist within the given communities.

The New Brunswick Bicentennial Commission has had for its mandate the task of motivating and co-ordinating events and activities to commemorate suitably this year-long celebration of the province's 200th anniversary. The commission was funded jointly and equally by the provincial government of New Brunswick and the federal government.

Under the publications program of the New Brunswick Bicentennial Commission, in conjunction with the Department of Cultural and Historic Resources of the province, some 70 books on the local history and heritage of the people of New Brunswick will have been published during this bicentennial year.

Some 400 special projects of a regional or provincial nature, funded on a grant basis by the commission, will also have taken place during the course of the year. In this year, marking this historic anniversary, New Brunswickers are proud that they will receive Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II and His Holiness Pope John Paul II. New Brunswickers are also delighted that they will receive visits from some of the tall ships making their way in the parade of sail to the province of Quebec to participate in the celebrations commemorating the 450th anniversary of the arrival of Jacques Cartier.

Honourable senators, I bring this matter to your attention because just the other day, while I was attending a particular function at the Norton Post Office in my lovely County of Kings, a young grade 4 schoolgirl named Tammy Gilchrist of Norton, who obviously is enthusiastic about events taking place in the bicentennial, portrayed by a crayon sketch how appropriate it would be for a stamp containing in its design those two great ingredients much enjoyed by all Brunswickers and, indeed, by Canadians generally, namely, fish and fiddleheads. The Honourable Roméo LeBlanc, on behalf of the Postmaster General, unveiled a stamp commemorating the bicentennial of the Province of New Brunswick in the province's capital on Monday, June 18. I trust that this stamp will suitably reflect the aspirations of all New Brunswickers and the pride they feel as they look back upon the 200 years of New Brunswick history. However, I did want to mention how appropriate it was for that keen and perceptive young person to think of a stamp as being a fitting way to recognize the province's anniversary celebration.

Honourable senators, further to what I have already mentioned as taking place during the course of 1984 in the province of New Brunswick, I would be remiss if I did not mention that it will be a summer of family reunions. Some 400 family reunions are scheduled to take place throughout the province during the next four months. This represents movement within the province of in excess of 150,000 people. The theme of this year for New Brunswickers and, indeed, for all is "discover New Brunswick".

We invite all Canadians and all our friends to be with us and to discover the pride that we New Brunswickers hold for our very special place. Among the original signatories to Canada's Confederation, New Brunswickers still practise a living and dynamic Canadianism. The only officially bilingual province in the country, the province of New Brunswick is proud to reflect truly the fabric that is Canada. Two official languages, many cultures, native peoples, all working together sharing the good times, the troubled times, but all the while maintaining a unique pride in the heritage that is ours.

Honourable senators, I wish to thank you for having given me the opportunity to say a few words on what is going on this year in my part of the country—New Brunswick.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I should like briefly to join with Senator Cyril Sherwood in inviting all of you to come and celebrate our bicentennial with us this summer. There will be many more than the usual events to enjoy in New Brunswick. I might say that, along with Senator Sherwood, I was happy to participate in the events which took place on June 18, it being our two hundredth anniversary and, by coincidence, my birthday anniversary.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McElman: So New Brunswick and I celebrated together. I drew this fact to the attention of my friend and colleague, Senator Sherwood, and his wife, as we were walking towards the Legislative Assembly Building for the unveiling of the New Brunswick stamp. As usual, Senator Sherwood played one-upmanship and said, "Ah, but mine is July 1." So along with him I welcome you all to New Brunswick to join us in this celebration this year.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Sixth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

(For text of report see Appendix "C", p. 761)

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources concerning a review of the recommendations contained in the Fifth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, entitled "Marching to the Beat of the Same Drum", tabled in the Senate on March 30, 1983, and ask that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day to form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "D", p. 763.)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be taken into consideration later this day.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

● (1410)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday, June 25, 1984 at eight o'clock in the evening.

If leave is granted, honourable senators, I shall give an explanation and make some comments about our program for next week.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as you will remember, last week it was thought possible that this week we would receive Bill C-9, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act, and that we would probably receive no other legislation. Bill C-9 was to be passed before proceeding with other legislation, because it was being given top priority.

It now transpires that the minister responsible in the other place did not give time allocation notice until Monday, and therefore the debate on the motion itself took place only yesterday. Now, two days of debate follow and the bill will not, therefore, be voted on until tomorrow.

Senator Olson, Senator Flynn and I discussed this matter earlier today and, as Senator Flynn pointed out, there are some 90 proposed amendments to that bill. If leave is not given, each one of these must be voted on. The final vote would be deferred, but I believe that the motion covering each amendment has to be voted on separately.

Therefore, honourable senators, if I had had the 20/20 vision I now have in hindsight, I would have known that there was no reason for us to be present in the Senate this week as far as legislation is concerned. However, I did not have that 20/20 vision last week and that is why we are here today. Since we will probably not receive Bill C-9 until, at the earliest, late Thursday night or Friday morning of this week, I am suggesting that we adjourn until Monday night at eight o'clock.

As I say, Senator Olson, Senator Flynn and I have discussed the program for next week and our objective for Royal Assent on whatever legislation is passed is Thursday. I would like to say a word about the legislation that we might be receiving after the passage of Bill C-9. The plan in the other place is to give priority to bills that are at the report stage. That is the first of the three categories of priority. First priority is given to bills in the report stage; second priority to bills that were close to the report stage; and third priority to any other bills.

The bills that are at the report stage in the other place are Bill C-40, the Old Age Security Amendments Bill, Bill C-33, the Western Grain Stabilization Bill; Bill C-37, the National Housing Bill; Bill C-7, the Customs Tariff Amendment Bill, and Bill C-8, the Special Import Measures Bill.

Two bills have been the subject of a number of hearings at the committee stage and are close to the report stage. Those are Bill C-32, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Bill, and Bill C-34, the Canada Labour Code.

Some of the other bills that might be received, if they fall into these first two categories, are Bill C-43, the Canada-Nova
